What we're into 'Ear Biscuits' podcast

"Ear Biscuits" podcast by Link Neal and Rhett McLaughlin is my go-to background noise at the moment.

Neal and McLaughlin are the creators of the internet show "Good Mythical Morning," which is a similar, less serious series that I've been watching since middle school. In the podcast, which has more than 300 episodes, they discuss a wide variety of topics, from the years they spent in college and as missionaries to the theories on the future of automation and humanity and tips for escaping pyramid schemes.

They take inspiration from Reddit threads, listener call-ins, their own children's ideas and more. Some episodes are more personal and philosophical than others.

One episode features Matthew McConaughey, where they discuss how to live a life worth living. In another, Neal advises McLaughlin on how to handle the departure of his oldest child to college, having just had his eldest daughter move to school himself.

Some, though, are shorter discussions about their top 10 favorite movies, quarantine activities such as board games and how they managed to survive their teen years without cell-phones.

No matter the topic, the pair approaches each episode with humor and wit, a refreshing attitude in podcasting. I encourage you to listen: there is truly an episode for everybody.
