Roped by Telephone

By HERBERT L. McNARY

(© 1925 Western Newspaper Union.)

THE OFFICE door opened and Cyril Tinkham swung around from his desk with a hopeful, expectant look he kept in stock to greet his clients, but the look faded and while it did not actually turn into one of disappointment, still it faded. He was looking into the countenance of his friend, Roscoe Blake.

Those features were usually illuminated by a smile, but Roscoe was not smiling now. Maybe that meant trouble, and maybe that meant a client—even Roscoe might be embroiled in legal difficulties.

"Something wrong?" asked Cyril. "You said it," grunted Roscoe. "That's why I'm here."

"You want legal advice," declared Cyril confidently. "No I don't either. I'd have to pay for that. I want sympathy. Besides it's too late for advice."

"What happened?" "I got hooked for $500."

"Cards or horses?" "Neither—the stock market."

"Haven't you a comeback?" "Now, you're looking for a case," laughed Roscoe. "Nothing doing, I'm not a poor loser. I'll take my licking, but just the same I like to pour my tale of woe out on somebody. I could use that $500."

"What was the stock?" "Seco Copper."

"Never heard of it," declared Cyril with finality. "And you never will. It was never listed."

"What? You mean to tell me, Roscoe, that you bought an unlisted stock?"

"Worse. I bought it over the telephone from someone I never saw."

"Well, of all the fool stunts, I thought you—"

"Wait a minute," interrupted Roscoe, rising from his seat and crossing to the window. "I said I wanted sympathy, not a lecture. You never listened to this bird who talked to me. He was an artist and deserved all he got, including my $500."

"Well, no artist would get me over the telephone."

"You seem confident. I'd like to get this chap to rig you and make a bet on it. He owes me that much at least after roping me."

"Go ahead," taunted the lawyer. Roscoe looked out at the dreary buildings and then he brightened. "All right, it's a bet. How much?"

"How much do you want to make it?" asked the lawyer. "Make it the $500 I lost."

"You want to lose an even thousand, I see."

Roscoe smiled. "Did you ever hear that saying about he who smiles last?"

A week or two elapsed before Cyril Tinkham picked up his desk phone to answer a voice that immediately intrigued him. There was something magnetic about the tone, some indefinable personality.

"Mr. Tinkham? Mr. Barker speaking on the recommendations of some very prominent people who have selected you as an enterprising young lawyer to interest in a new invention. We need representative men to endorse it and get it started. You might naturally expect that I would call personally with such a proposition rather than talk to you over the phone; but it happens that only by this method can I give you a demonstration. This invention is something that will revolutionize the telephone industry as you will readily understand when I tell you that while I have been talking to you, you have been scribbling on a red blotter with a yellow pencil."

Cyril gasped and snapped his head away from the mouth-piece, which he inspected in amazement.

"I don't wonder you sprang away," continued the voice, laughing pleasantly. "And now let's have a further demonstration. Do something and I'll tell you what it is. You have just put the pencil in your right hand vest pocket—now you place it in your left—you shifted the receiver to your right ear—you are now standing up—now you are at the desk—you are dancing—now you are waving your arms. Does that satisfy you, Mr. Tinkham?"

"It certainly does," beamed the cocky lawyer. "And you want me to take an interest in it?"

"Not exactly. We just want you to vouch for it in our advertisements."

"But don't I get a chance to come in on it," protested the lawyer.

"Well," hesitated the voice. "The issue is small and about taken up. I might be able to procure you a thousand shares. Would you take that?"

"Certainly. How much do I pay?"

"You pay $500 to your friend Roscoe Blake in accordance with the terms of a bet you recently made. And now, if you will glance out your window to the story above of the building running at right angles to yours, you will see where Roscoe has been watching you make a darn fool of yourself all over your desk."

Couldn't Condemn Frame

The profiteer was showing off the picture gallery of his new house. He had scarcely had time to look at the pictures, but had ordered magnificent frames for them.

When the guest stopped opposite a picture, and said: "Ah, an old master, surely—oh, yes, this is very old," the profiteer said, hurriedly: "Yes, but it's a new frame."

Notables Coming to Bay

An invitation has been extended the Coquille Chamber of Commerce by the Marshfield Chamber to have a delegation present at their big annual dinner on the evening of June 16. At that time Gov. Pierce, the members of the state highway commission, prominent citizens of Portland, one or two railroad officials and others are expected to be present. The dinner will be held in the armory and those intending to go from here should notify Secretary N. C. Kelly, as the Marshfield hosts will reserve a section near the speakers' table for the Coquille contingent.
