Many Die—Wrong Treatment

The increasing number of fatalities from automobile accidents is alarming and a careful investigation of the facts makes it apparent that many of these victims might have been saved had proper treatment been instituted at once.

In 1922 one hundred and four lost their lives in Oregon because of automobile accidents, or nearly 13 to each 100,000 population. In 1924 the slaughter had been increased to one hundred and fifty-nine, which makes a yearly rate of 20 to the 100,000.

In these days of speed it behooves everybody to be careful. The automobile is the cause of accidents every hour, most of which are preventable. Each death is a loss of human need to our state. What is more, many of the deaths might have been prevented had they received intelligent care at the time of the accident. Rushing badly injured, cold and wet victims in trucks, or in rattle-trap cars over long distances, in many instances has simply hastened death. These people died from shock rather than from injuries.

It is very important to understand that any one in a state of collapse is actually slowly dying, that precious life is ebbing away. Years ago it was customary to stress in serious accidents only that one should watch out for symptoms of nervous shock. Today we do not limit our warning to serious accident cases alone but rather guard against shock at all times and under all circumstances.

It is computed that in seven out of ten accidental deaths nervous shock is to blame. This distressing figure can be greatly lessened if people only knew how to recognize and treat nervous shock immediately.

The Allied Military Medical Commission appointed during the World War made a distinct study of shock and collapse and emphasized the following four points:

1. Rough handling was found to be the most dangerous feature in the treatment of shock.
2. Warmth and quiet outstripped all other methods in healing the case.
3. Administration of hot fluids was found to be most beneficial.
4. Shock was always aggravated by the sight of one's wounds.

What Fairview Voted

The Sentinel was somewhat incorrect last week in its report of the Fairview road district election. The levy voted was 10 mills, which will raise somewhere near $11,000 and it was divided to be spent as follows:

- Fifty per cent from the feet of the maintain to Coquille.
- Twenty-five per cent from the end of the present grade, a mile and a half north of the Fairview crossroads, toward Summit.
- Twenty-five per cent on the road from the falls, near Dexter & Barber's camp, to the ford on the North Fork near the Williams & Phillips ranch.

W. J. Cox Paroled

W. J. Cox, sentenced to two years in the penitentiary for larceny of the sheep and stealing gas from the state supplies at China Camp, was paroled by Judge Knudsen in the custody of his uncle, J. H. Whinnick, of Bridge. He must go to work, report monthly to the court and not leave the county.

10 Million a Year for Eggs

The production of eggs is now generally termed an industry, for it employs thousands of people and millions of capital, and is a distinct branch of trade on the Pacific Coast, says the current number of the Standard Oil Bulletin. Tradition has it that the modern egg industry on the Pacific Coast was started by A. J. Bennett of Petaluma, California, which is perhaps the most important center of the poultry industry west of the Mississippi. Here, according to the story, a most intelligent facility in the form of a cross-breed guinea fowl, which he converted into the original egg-catch, where the single fowl then was the production and marketing of eggs.

During the prohibition stage of California it was necessary to import both eggs and feed into the state, and only in the last three years have Oregon and Washington joined California as exporters of surplus production. Washington's export in 1922 exceeded twelve million dollars in value, while Oregon's exports of poultry products in the same year totaled over ten million dollars.

Over half a million cases of California egg went to New York last year and sold at a premium. Pacific Coast eggs are usually sold at auction in New York City. The Poultry Producers of Central California report that a premium of twenty-five cents or more per dozen wholesale is paid for guaranteed California eggs. About two-thirds of a million cases of eggs were exported from California, and approximately three hundred thousand cases moved from Oregon and Washington in 1922 to eastern states. While many thousands of cases are forwarded to eastern states in refrigerator cars, it has been found practicable to ship eggs on the coast since 1920-21 via refrigerators from San Francisco to New York via Panama. This method is employed when rates are advantageous. Suitable refrigerator compartments are available on most of the larger vessels operating in regular schedules between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts.

Alaska, Nevada, Arizona, and Hawaii do not produce enough eggs at the present time to supply home requirements, which are met in a large measure by the three exporting states previously mentioned. The companies introduced into Hawaii from India to destroy vermin is most destructive to poultry and increases the problems and cost of raising poultry in the Hawaiian Islands.
