Hams Are Tokens of Friendship in China

The Chinese have many ham dishes of their own—fried, smoked, steamed and boiled. On such occasions as weddings, birthdays of important persons, the birth of a first son, spring and autumn festivals and, most of all, at Chinese New Year, the Chinese send gifts to each other much like westerners, but more lavishly, the North China Herald says.

If a ham is the first present in the parcel, the recipient feels that an appropriate display of friendship has been made and appreciates it accordingly. Various factors contribute to the reputation of Chekiang hams. One is that hogs and pigs thrive well in that province, which is believed to affect the flavor of the meat. Anyway, they are famed throughout the country. Another is that the hog food available favors the production of red flesh.

The prosperity enjoyed by the Chekians makes it possible for nearly every farming family to raise a couple of pigs every season. Public opinion, as a matter of fact, is against those who do not keep pigs regarding them as shiftless indeed.

Writer Evidently Peaved

A writer to an English review recently delivered himself of the following blast against psychoanalysts: "I am not one of those who usually sympathize with murderers and sign petitions to get them off. But if ever I felt there was some reason for murder, it is in the case of the Austrian boy who murdered his aunt because she psychoanalyzed him, and published the results in a book. One knows the kind of a book, and the kind of a woman, and I doubt if the loss of the one is to be deplored more than the other."

The following poem was written by Henry Whobrey, 6th grade:

Old Santa Claus has reindeer
Which are quick as light,
Some people say he travels at day
But I say, at night.

He came to our chimney looking
Bright

And the roof was shining with ice
The reindeer pranced with fright
But Santa thought it very nice.

Just then he made a big bound
I heard a bump and he hit the ground.

Then a laughter came out from the boys,
But Santa said, "For naughty ones no toys."
