DAIRY FACTS

FEED DAIRY COWS GRAIN IN SUMMER

That it is false economy for dairymen to depend on pasture alone for feed during the summer months is shown in the case of Dave Ehredt, an Illinois dairyman living near Elizabeth, Jo Daviess county, who last year lost just $19.40 worth of milk and butterfat in saving $7.72 worth of feed on each of his cows. This is shown in a report recently sent to the college of agriculture, University of Illinois, by Clyde Nichols, tester in the dairy herd improvement association of which Ehredt is a member.

During the year ending April 30, 1926, which included all the 1925 pasture season, eight representative cows in his herd gave an average of 5,860 pounds of milk containing 242.25 pounds butterfat. They ate an average of 1,523 pounds of grain during the year. The previous year the same eight cows each produced an average of 6,455 pounds of milk containing 278.5 pounds butterfat and ate 2,066 pounds of grain. They were fed grain as a supplement to pasture during the summer of 1924, whereas no grain was fed for this purpose during the 1925 pasture season.

In saving 483 pounds of grain a cow, Ehredt sacrificed 625 pounds of milk and butterfat. The grain was worth $7.72, while the milk and butterfat were worth $19.40, making a net loss of $11.68 from not feeding grain.

This is a representative case of the many reports sent in by dairy herd improvement association testers demonstrating the false economy of depending on pasture alone for feed during the summer months. H. E. Jamison, assistant in dairy extension, said. The ordinary pasture crop furnishes a cow with roughage only, and it is impossible for a high-producing cow to eat the volume of this relatively coarse material which is necessary to maintain both production and body condition.

It takes a good pasture even to provide the necessary nutrients for a cow giving a pound of butterfat a day. For cows producing more than this amount, some grain should be fed even with the best pasture, the amount depending on the production of the cows and the condition of the pasture. One pound of grain for each five pounds of milk is often recommended.

A suitable ration for dairy cows consists of equal parts ground corn, ground oats and wheat bran. Another good ration consists of three parts each of ground corn and ground oats and one part linseed oil meal or cottonseed meal. As the season advances and the pasture becomes poorer, the amount of linseed or cottonseed meal should be increased to about one-fourth of the ration.

Profitable Cows Raised From Pure-Bred Sires

When scrub sires are directly compared to pure-bred sires the evidence is always greatly in favor of the pure bred. Two cow testing associations in Wisconsin have recently published comparisons. In one association, cows sired by grade bulls averaged 144.8 pounds butterfat; those by pure-bred sires, 230 pounds. In the second association the grade sire's daughters produced 215 pounds butterfat per year as compared to 295 pounds per cow for those sired by pure-bred sires. Eighty pounds more butter at 40 cents a pound means $32.00 per cow per year; or $320.00 for each ten heifer calves produced; which means $640.00 to be credited to the pure-bred sire for two years use if he sired ten heifers per year. Since it requires about 200 pounds butter per cow to break even, no profit was made on the daughters of the grade sires; and the owners who used these sires had to pay wages, if any, for their labor.—Charles I. Bray, Colorado Agricultural college.

Room for Expansion in Dairying, Says A. Boss

Andrew Boss, vice director of the Minnesota experiment station, does not believe that the dairy business is likely to be overdone. There is nothing to fear, he says, in the moderate expansion of dairying in regions favorable to the industry. "The probable increase in cows and in dairy production," he says, "will be met by the probable increase in population and by increased use of dairy products so long as business and industrial conditions remain as at present. With comparatively higher prices for beef stock, many of the general purpose cattle raisers, who have been milking some of their cows, will go back to beef raising, thus reducing milk production somewhat, to the advantage of the dairymen."

Way for Better Sires

The average number of dairy animals kept on the Indiana farm is 4.4 cows, and the average yearly production of these cows is slightly over 4,000 pounds of milk, according to R. D. Canan, dairy extension specialist at Purdue university. This low production indicates a need for better breeding. How to provide high-class purebred bulls for the many small dairymen in the state, is one of the most important problems in improving the dairy condition.

Got Out Just in Time

A large crowd gathered around an inverted Star car along the Roseburg highway just out of Myrtle Point Sunday evening, many thinking some one was under it. The story is that two Bandon girls were driving at an excessive rate of speed and in serpentine fashion, followed closely for some distance by another car. At last the girls thought a speed cop was trailing them and they became frightened and threw the car off the side of the road and took across country afoot. They hadn't any more than left the car before it slid off the bank and turned over a couple of times. The car was brought to the Emery service station, little the worse from its experience.—Myrtle Point American.

House Burns on East Fork

The house on the Bill Olson place on the East Fork was totally destroyed by fire Monday about noon. The roof caught fire during the preparation of the noonday meal, and when seen the flames were beyond control. The house was a two-story frame and said to have been a valuable building. There was $2500 insurance carried through Wallace Dement agency here in Myrtle Point, and written by the Liverpool London & Globe company. The Olson place is known better by old residents as the Bill Smith place, the Olson family having lived there but a few years. It is likely Mr. Olson will rebuild at once.—American

$1000 for Marked Salmon

$1,000 in rewards is offered by the Oregon Fish commission for the reporting of marked salmon caught by fishermen in the various streams of Oregon, according to the reports from Clyde Chase. For each marked fish that is caught by fishermen, one dollar is paid. When reporting the capture, fishermen are to report the kind of fish, the date of capture, the size and weight and the sex, with about forty scales to determine the age of the catch. This reward is offered by the Oregon fish commission to check on the fish that are liberated each year. The salmon are marked by clipped fins.
