Coos County Honored

Coos county has been highly honored in that three of her young women have been selected by the great Presbyterian church for special service.

Miss Genevieve Chase, of this city, has been elected to membership on the Board of Christian Education, being the only student to be thus honored.

Miss Helen Whitaker, of Myrtle Point, and well known in Coos county, sails for China September 8th to do work under the Foreign Mission Board, as teacher in a Chinese school in Northern China.

Miss Estella Parker, also of Myrtle Point, sails September 7th, for Alaska where she will teach in the Sheldon Jackson School under the Board of National Missions.

Rev. Charles C. Hulet, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Myrtle Point, is planning a special service for these young ladies on August 29th, the last Sunday they will be with us.

Beachmen at "Klatawa"

Commissioner Jas. T. Jenkins, who was here from Bandon last Saturday, says that the Bandon Beachmen made a big hit at the celebration in Eugene last week. Two score Beachmen were in the parade and their float consisted of a large tank, 12x4x4 feet, on a truck, in which mermaids were paddling about. Their appearance was greeted with cheers everywhere.

As was the case at the Corn Show here last year, the Coos Bay Pirates were conspicuous by their absence, only one Buccaneer showing up in Eugene.

Easy Come and Easy Go

"MY BESS doesn't have to exert herself a mite to get attention," said Della Smith complacently. "None of these modern tricks to get the boys."

Her companion, mother of homely Abby Phillips, gave forth a vague sound that might have meant anything.

The two women were enjoying the Wednesday "movie" matinee.

"Have a carmel? Luke Whittier brought 'em to Bess and she can't abide 'em." Della passed over a handful. "Between you and me, beans have always come so easy to Bess she doesn't appreciate 'em. She sure leads Luke a dance and he doesn't mind a mite. My, isn't that the thrillin'est kiss!"

Meanwhile, the two under discussion were spinning along the Post road, and could the girl's mother have overheard them she would have had to revise her estimate of Luke's enjoyment of her daughter's habits.

"You've got to quit, Bess," he was saying doggedly. "Either you take me for worse or better and tell the world, or I am going to get another girl."

"I suppose," she ventured airily, "you want to know if you can take me to your old Athletic club dance."

"Partly," admitted Luke. "But there's more than that. I want you to announce our engagement and quit going around with other fellows. That's only fair."

Bess opened her little bead bag, took out a chamols case, opened that, and took out a ring. "Here you are, Luke," she said coldly. "I won't be driven."

Luke pulled up to the side of the road. "You really mean it, Bess?"

Bess nodded. "I can be obstinate, too," she said.

A moment later Luke had turned his car back toward Pottersville and the two occupants rode home without another word.

If Bess had not given Luke a decisive answer about the Athletic dance it was neither because she did not intend to go nor, as far as that went, because she did not intend to go with Luke. Only Bess was by disposition a scalp hunter, and as long as no one knew that she was going with Luke and did not remotely suspect that she was secretly engaged to him, she would receive other invitations.

If, in the days that followed, she missed Luke's thoughtfulness and pleasant ways, she gave no outward sign. Luke, passing her on the street, could not but notice that she was so earnestly engaged in laughing and chatting with Gene Phillips, the homely Abby's brother, that she quite neglected to throw him more than the curtest of nods.

For a week or two Gene called frequently upon her. Then an out-of-town girl distracted his attention and he gave way to Floyd Bacon, a youth Bess secretly hadn't much use for, but who served to pass the time.

Then she heard that Luke had asked Abby to the Athletic dance, Pottersville's big annual affair among the young people. And so far no one had invited her. Bess wasn't exactly worried, but she had reached the point where the first invitation wouldn't be toyed with as had Luke's. Just imagine that homely Abby being asked and Bess Smith allowed to stay home. Unthinkable.

The day came when the dance was a week away. Then a question of days. And finally a matter of mere hours. In the closet upstairs hung the most charming of dresses of the most lovely blue, while at its feet were two of the dearest bronze slippers imaginable. And, for all their beauty, they seemed doomed to remain unworn.

When the strains of the first fox trot floated upon the mellow air Bess, who lived not far from the hall, rose from her bed, where she had been lying with face buried in the pillows, and stole to the window. Late couples were still going up the street. Yes, Abby was still dressing, for a light burned in her bedroom, and occasional shadows moved across the curtain. Sensibly she held no particular grudge against Abby. In the past few days she had had time to review her own conduct and to decide that she had only herself to blame. She had had Luke and had not lifted a finger to keep him.

Then she saw Abby coming out of her gate. She drew back. It would cause her a great deal of pain to see Luke's dear figure beside Abby's. Wait—that dumpy youth wasn't—couldn't be Luke, the tall and broad-shouldered.

Bess didn't stop to look again—didn't pause to consider the possibility of Luke's going with some one else than Abby. She fairly flew down the stairs, two at a time, to the telephone.

"Luke? Luke? Not going? To the dance?"

"Oh—you—you wouldn't take up with anyone else—"

"Why, I heard—oh, Luke, you darling! Hurry! Yes, I'll be ready in a jiff and I'll tell everyone we're engaged and, oh, I guess when a girl really cares, she'll do some of the chasing, too!"

"Yes," said her mother, "Bess certainly looked sweet in that new dress." The two women were talking over things at the pictures. "Luke's a nice boy, I always say 'Easy come, easy go,' but Bess never found it that way. Have a carmel!"

Salmon Caught Off Coos Bay Threshing Done Before the Rain
Salmon fishing off Coos Bay this week has been successful and profitable. Cecil Holland in four days fishing off the bar caught 15,000 pounds which sold for over $1000. Two big fish were caught there similar to the California tuna, one of them weighing 19 pounds.
Threshing on Catching creek was almost done before the rain Tuesday, the Albert Schroeder threshing outfit from Arago having finished 55 acres of oats and vetch for John Fabry and about 18 acres for A. R. Davenport. Yields are reported to have been low due to dry weather and rust injury.—Myrtle Point American.
