Rational Land Use Needed

Many elements in flood control, including reforestation and the maintenance of protective forest cover on watersheds, bring us to the basic problem of rational use of land, says Chief Forester William B. Greeley in a statement just received from him by District Forester C. M. Granger, Portland, Oregon.

"No changes in our use of the land can prevent large floods when exceptionally heavy rains occur. The primary control of large floods rests with the engineer. But the productive use of land, aside from insuring such public benefits as timber supply, conservation of forage, the saving of soil fertility, and the preservation of wild life, can aid in the amelioration of flood conditions."

In a statement before the recent Mississippi Flood Control Conference at Chicago, Colonel Greeley urged that in the study of flood control measures on the Mississippi a survey be made of the forested, denuded, and abandoned farm lands in the basin. This survey, he said, should set forth the areas where more complete protection from forest fires is needed; where extensive tree planting should be done; and where public forest ownership, either state or federal, is necessary to flood control. Based upon the survey he would have specific recommendations made for the guidance of federal agencies in administering the present forestry laws, for additional legislation if needed, and for determining the co-operative share to be assumed by the several states in attaining the ends sought.

"Any benefits derived from reforestation cannot be secured overnight. They will come about only through a long space of time. Hence forests cannot be substituted for the engineering structures upon which our main reliance must be placed for controlling heavy flood discharges. They can supplement dams or levees, but cannot take their place. In dealing with this problem, forestry should be the handmaiden of engineering; but as a handmaiden it has a valuable service to offer."
