IF I COULD TALK

If I could talk, I think I'd say, "Good morning, Jim, how do you do today?"

And then I'd josh my friend a bit about his car, or dog or cat. And then I'd try and not forget to praise his wife, and things like that.

That makes a fellow feel content To try his best another day. His faults and failures I'd forget. And never speak of things that mock.

If I could talk.

Friday was a "red letter day" for little Buster Lawhorn, son of R. H. Lawhorn; he was out on his horse in the evening after school and ran across a coyote that had got caught in a trap. Mr. Coyote was only caught by the skin and would have been loose in a short time, but nothing daunted Buster shot him with his daddy's big rifle. It was a large animal, almost as large as a wolf. That was some day's adventure for a ten year old and a big day's profit as well. Buster is a descendant of Daniel Boone and is another proof that "blood will tell."

The work of rocking Cherry Creek hill is still going on but that road is not a safe one yet, especially after a little rain. "Rookies" for Armistice Day

Many motion pictures have contained aeroplane and balloon stunts, but it remained for "Rookies," Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer's farce comedy, to show an entire sequence filmed in the air, most of it in the basket of a balloon, floating thousands of feet above Hollywood. More than a week was spent in the balloon basket by Director Sam Wood, Marcelline Day, Karl Dane and George Arthur, during the filming of the picture, which will be shown at the Liberty Theatre under the auspices of the local post of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States on Armistice Day, November 11th.
