Novel Fabrics in Season's Fashions

New Light Weight Materials and Unusual Mixtures for Costumes.

Woolens have come back strongly this season. Many frock models that formerly were devoted exclusively to thinner fabrics, notes a fashion writer in the New York Times, are now adapted to these weaves, and produce costumes in the top note of the mode. Every woman requires a dress that may be worn with a separate coat of fur and cloth, as well as a coat of this description, which is not necessarily of the same stuff as the gown, but which will go with everything for daytime or informal evening occasions. In the spring collections these needs are answered by many woolen one-piece frocks and top coats in shades that will harmonize with almost every color.

A one-piece dress that is both youthful and smart is made by a Parisian modiste of banana wool ottoman, which resembles corded silk. In its weave, and is almost as light in texture. The skirt has a bias cut creating a flare in front and another at the side. The neck of the bodice is finished high with a straight band of brown suede with a buckle in front, from which hangs a jabot of self material. A belt of the suede is worn. This frock will look well with a coat of brown tweed, of any brown fur or with just a brown neck piece.

An unusual number of these costumes are made in the quiet shades of browns, tans, beige and grays. Much red is used, and white for out-of-doors is shown for summer. The present fancy for low-posed drapery and trimming is illustrated in a chic frock of capucine red wool crepe, in which an effect of separate bodice and skirt is given by a belt of folded cloth. About the lower part of the skirt, which is straight and narrow, the material is tucked in clusters, and the bodice fastens down one side with narrow straps and silver buckles. A sports hat of red bako and gray kid sandals complete this attractive costume. With it will be worn a coat in a gray, black and white mixture, and, on occasion, a scarf of gray fox.

Cut on Princess Lines.

A frock that is distinctive and graceful in style and serviceable for general wear is cut on the princess lines that are now so fashionable. It is made of dark blue wool crepe with a closing at one side from neck to hem finished with a stitched band and frill of ecru batiste and lace. The lower part of the frock has a slight flare and there is a pointed yoke stitched in three tiers between the bust line and the hips. Deep cuffs are outlined with the same stitching and a slightly pointed collar is finished with the same stitched bands. The shoulders are fitted with clusters of fine tucks.

Some delightful frocks are shown made of white woolen fabrics in diversified weaves and weights. A basket pattern, soft and downy and of "feather" weight, is used for a smart little frock made with a deep box-plaited sounce on the skirt and a plain bodice of easy fit, which is buttoned with large pearl buttons down one side.

Another model, all white, brings in to notice old-fashioned cashmere. The design is original. The front is caught in a cluster of gathers at each side of the normal waist line and held with a narrow sash belt tied in a bow on one hip. The neck has a short scarf with ends that reach to the belt, and three folds of the goods in graduated lengths are sewn across the front of the skirt.

White frocks in which a belt, scarf or waistcoat of colored silk is introduced and others that are stitched and embroidered in color are shown for summer.

The coats that are worn with frocks of different materials and color need to be carefully chosen this season because they must be suitable for many occasions. Tweeds and homespuns are
