The Third Degree

By W. H. COLCLOUGH

GO on, Jackson, go on! I tell you there is no use losing two lives. We are lost, hopelessly lost. We can't both get out—I am an old man with only a few years left to live, anyway.

Jackson weakened under the battery of the old man's logic. Nevertheless, he continued to register protests.

"We can surely make it," he said. "I can't leave you, Mr. Burton. Let's struggle on together. You know these woods and I will help you."

"No Jackson, we are done for. Go on without me—go straight south. I don't know how far, but I know that's the direction. Go south and you will come to a river. Follow it the way the stream flows and you will be sure to come to a hunter's cabin. Stay there until morning. Then get help, and come back here—back track and get my body."

The old man wheezed his commands. He staggered.

"Well, Mr. Burton, I don't like to leave you this way, and—"

"Go, Jackson," said Mr. Burton. "You haven't long. The storm's increasing. Leave me here. Tell them you were game, but that I sent you away. Hurry, Jackson."

Jackson gripped the old man's hand and turned toward the trackless south and safety. In twenty paces he stopped. He couldn't leave him. What would he say? What would the men at the office say? Besides, this was a coward's trick. It wasn't the Law of the North.

Why did they get into this fix anyway? Mr. Burton was supposed to be the best woodsman in this part of the Canadian Northland, and hunted here year after year. That is how it happened that Jackson, a young executive in Burton's big plant, had accepted an invitation to go moose hunting. Burton was old, but he was experienced—used to hunting without bothering about a guide in this territory.

But the unexpected had happened. Night was coming. They had been lost for several hours, and the old man was exhausted. And what had started as a drizzling rain gave promise of turning into snow before morning.

Yes—it seemed as if he had a right to the chance for his life, but—

In two minutes he was back beside the old man.

"Mr. Burton—I'm not going. You can say what you like, but we stay together, and if we go out, we'll go out together."

"You fool, Jackson," the old man argued. "You must go!"

But Jackson proceeded to break off such spruce bows as he could gather and make a rude shelter under the trees.

It was cold. No fire. Garments soaked. The old man trembling. Up north the howling of a wolf. In three seconds, an answer strangely and menacingly near echoed through the woods. A large tree not far away split with a sound like a rifle. They huddled together as best they could for warmth. Jackson shivered. The old man stirred.

"Jackson, I hear bells," he said.

"Listen, Jackson! Don't you hear bells? Let's try again, Jackson. I think I know, now, how to get out of this place."

Vainly Jackson tried to pacify the older man and pointed out to him the futility of trying to find the way through a Canadian forest at night. Any hunter, even a tenderfoot, knows the impossibility of such a task.

But the old man, president of a large business organization and used to having his orders promptly obeyed, insisted.

"I'll stay here," Jackson thought, "and let the old fool go on alone. He's crazy now." And he let Burton start off through the darkness.

But in a few minutes Jackson was following him.

"Look, Jackson, there's a light."

"Yes, a light, Mr. Burton." He might as well hum to the wanderings of the half-crazed mind.
