IT PAYS TO FEED COWS IN SUMMER

Big Mistake to Overlook Grain in Dairy Ration.

New York dairymen who do not feed grain to their milk cows in summer while they are on pasture are overlooking a safe method of increasing their net income, says F. B. Morrison, head of the animal husbandry department at Cornell University. It is surprising, he says, that many men who take much trouble in providing their cows with excellent rations during the barn feeding period of the year, depend blindly on Dame Nature in summer.

Pasture alone was satisfactory for cows in early days, when even the best of them yielded an amount of milk we would now consider too low for profit. By skillful selection and breeding, the modern high-yielding dairy cow has been developed, with a capacity for producing milk so great that any ordinary pasture will not furnish her enough feed both for milk production and for body maintenance.

The proper feeding of milk cows on pasture is much simpler than during the winter, and, says Professor Morrison, doubtless this is the reason why so many farmers, busy with their crops, fail to give their herd the necessary attention in summer. Often the cows are merely turned to pasture after milking at night and morning, with no further thought as to the supply of feed actually available for them. It is no wonder that when pasture becomes scanty in midsummer, the cows run down in flesh and fall off decidedly in milk yield. Even if fed liberally when barn-feeding starts in the fall, quite commonly they cannot then be brought back to normal and usual production. It is especially important to feed grain liberally when pastures become short and parched. This is important any year, and of particular importance this summer, when every foresighted dairymen desires to do his share in providing sufficient milk in the New York milk shed during the shortage period next November.

Under typical pasture conditions in the state, he says, experience shows that it is best to feed a grain mixture containing about 18 per cent protein, at the rate of one pound of grain to three pounds of Jersey and Guernsey milk, and one pound of grain to four pounds of Holstein, Ayrshire, or Shorthorn milk.

Increase Profitable Butterfat Production

The following are essentials in profitable butterfat production, according to H. H. Kildee, formerly of the dairy husbandry division of the University of Minnesota, University farm, St. Paul.

Proper shelter in a warm, light, well ventilated barn. The leeward side of a barbed wire fence is an expensive shelter for milk cows.

A knowledge of the herd through the use of milk scales and the Babcock test.

Corn silage and clover or alfalfa hay as patriotic, profitable, palatable feeds.

A grain ration in proportion to milk and butterfat produced.

Fall calving as a means of increasing production as well as price at a time when more labor is available.

A bushel of grain fed before calving rather than two fed afterward. Prepare the cows for the milking period.

Water of moderate temperature. Ice water is not conducive to greatest milk production.

A milking machine in case of labor shortage.

Co-operation with the neighbors in organizing cow-testing associations and purchasing feeds in carload lots.

Uncle Jim's Advice

By JANE OSBORN

"I'M SORRY," said the girl in the outer office as she regarded Jane Monday appraisingly, "but Mr. John Doremus and his uncle, the other Mr. John Doremus, are tied up in important conference. He simply cannot be interrupted."

The conference certainly was important, but not just the way the girl in the outer office thought it was. John Doremus, Sr., sat at his glass-covered mahogany desk, chair tilted back, smoking with all the serenity of a philosopher. His nephew sat almost as comfortably, also smoking, in an ample chair at the side of the desk. John Doremus, Sr., was president of the concern and his nephew was secretary. In the absence of the vice president and the treasurer, who completed the executive quartet of the concern, they were holding conference alone. Everyone who did not attend these conferences regarded them as of almost solemn importance.

"Of course, you ought to get married," said the elder Doremus.

"I guess you're right, Uncle John," said his namesake. "I've met a lot of nice girls lately, but I can't say that there is one of them that would want to marry me."

"How many have you proposed to?" asked the uncle.

The nephew was nonplussed at the question. "Why, none of them," he gasped. "I never proposed to a girl in my life."

"I'm blessed," said the older man, chuckling and looking over his glasses at his nephew in mild amazement. "I'll give you a bit of advice, and at the same time make a confession. When I was a younger man I was a good deal like you. Not bad looking, but not the sort that girls just naturally fell for. I wanted to get married, so I made up my mind that I'd 'fuss' every girl I knew that was at all attractive. I wouldn't wait until I fell in love with a girl so deeply that it would hurt to have her turn me down. And, added the uncle seriously, "I had made up my mind that if any girl ever did take me in good faith I wouldn't disappoint her. I'd stand by my guns."

"Well, I met a girl—a rather plain girl—and just from force of habit I rushed her, and before I knew it I was engaged to her. That is how I married your aunt Mary."

"But she is an attractive woman."

"Yes," chuckled the uncle. "That's the funny thing about it. So my plan was a good one after all. So, well, if you want to get married, by advice to you is that you start in making love. Just to get used to it."

The younger Doremus owed all his success in life to taking his Uncle John's advice. And by the time he left the conference in his uncle's room that morning he had definitely made up his mind to take the older man's advice in this matter.

To get to his own office he had to cross through the outer office. He was much preoccupied, not with business, but with thoughts of this new plan. He was wondering just how he would begin. And as he wondered he almost collided with Jane Monday. Jane Monday had come from her home four hundred miles away. Tom Monday, her brother, worked and lived here in the big city. She was passing through on her way to a house party and had only a few hours. She had lost her brother's address and wanted to get in touch with him. His name was not in the telephone directory, but she had found John's business place and here she was. John remembered her as one of the prettiest girls at a house party he had attended a year ago with his old college chum Tom Monday. Her very prettiness had made him excessively shy then. Now he remembered only Uncle John's advice.

"It's almost luncheon time," he said. "I'm going to take you to luncheon and you can look up your brother later."

"You're very dictatorial," she said and John Doremus told her that was the best policy.

At luncheon John Doremus looked intently into the pretty eyes of the girl opposite to him.

"I've often hoped that I would see you again," he fabricated.

The pretty eyes dropped. "I suppose I'll have to confess," she said falteringly. "I thought a great deal about you after that house party and—and I really haven't lost Tom's address at all. I just deliberately called on you because I wanted to see you. Do you think I'm dreadfully bold?"

"You're adorable," said John trying to hide his amazement. "I would have gone to you if you hadn't come to me. Jane, dear, I've loved you ever since I first saw you."

A fortnight later John Doremus, junior, held his hand out to his uncle. "I want to thank you, Uncle John, for your good advice. When I left your office the day you gave it to me I fairly ran into a pretty girl. I started in making love to her, just to get the habit. And now we're engaged. We're going to be married as soon as she can get her clothes—and it happens that she's the prettiest girl I ever saw."
