Canning the Pea Surplus

The Holt-Chase cannery in Myrtle Point has been operating double shift during the past several days, canning peas produced by growers in the Coquille valley this season. Arrangements were made to can the remainder of the crop following the discontinuation of shipment for the fresh market and the completion of contracts with the Ray-Maling Company, Inc., of Hillsboro.

With a view of successfully producing a new commercial crop in Coos county and stimulating interest in the production of more cash crops on farms, approximately 120 acres of peas were grown in the Coquille valley this year by J. E. Ford & Co., W. A. Tway & Son, S. H. Stockhoff, W. E. Cross, G. A. Collier, George E. Hampton, J. D. Carl and J. M. Jacobsen.

The crop, part of which was frozen for eastern markets, was sold to the Hillsboro firm. When the contract for the frozen market had been filled, several carloads were shipped from Coquille for fresh market and when the total contract with the Ray-Maling people was completed the growers started the cannery and will can something over fifty thousand cans of peas this fall, according to George Jenkins, county agent, who has been working with the growers since the enterprise was started.

While some of the operations connected with this project have not been as anticipated the project is regarded generally as successful. Yields have ranged from two tons to more than four tons per acre which is considered very satisfactory in the pea growing sections of the state. It is believed by most of the growers that the production of peas can be handled more satisfactorily and more profitably with the cannery in operation which will provide an outlet for some of the crop. The project has also been a material benefit to people of the county through employment provided both in the fields and at the cannery.
