Residents in this area, which has been so direly threatened by fire this year, heartily agree with the news story in last week's Sentinel, that more burning is what this county needs and then the woods would be clean. If the fire hazards were kept burned out then a period of low humidity would not find the county in such a highly combustible state. Unburned logging woods are left till they become an almost inevitable danger to green timber while if the burning was done deliberately when the humidity was high with sufficient men to watch there would be little danger. Old cedar tops are about as dangerous as gasoline-soaked rags when the humidity gets low. Surely Coos county will not have to suffer again from the wrong theory of protection.
