Way of a Maid

IT WAS spring when Alex kissed her and Constance still dreamed about it after autumn — after autumn when Robin's kiss was still very new. But later, when "Collin" only looked at her and never kissed at all — quite in keeping with the words of a charming poem — she was haunted by the kiss she had not yet known. She was beset with a desire to conquer Colin's indifference.

Alex, the kiss of spring still fresh in his mind, and hot in pursuit of Constance, was told that in the stages of love she believed there might just be liking. Robin, believe that his kiss of autumn was given as a seal of enduring love, was introduced to the idea of another stage. Constance referred to it as caring. And then she added that if you could still remember a kiss of spring, the kiss of autumn could not possibly be final. Robin reminded her, in heavy endurance, that they had not known each other in the spring. He thought Constance seemed to be thinking of something else — or some one else. He could not be sure.

One day when they were both flying at an airport Constance went up to Colin's plane and asked to accompany him. He said, "Sorry, it's a solo," and moved on down the runway and up like a bird, without the slightest glance back at her. Every other man would have been too readily thrilled. Colin's kind was very new to her. She wondered if to be seen much with Alex might make her more noticeable to Colin. When she tried this, Alex wondered why she would no longer let him kiss her. He was remembering, too, a kiss of spring as a tormenting memory. She asked him what it was like to wait and wait for what he wanted. He said she was clever all right but what was it all about?

Just as he was asking her this at a dance, Robin cut in and said, "For the rest of the evening you're mine, woman!" She looked over his shoulder at Colin dancing with a lovely girl, looking down at her as she looked up. Every girl had about Colin and he exactly as nice to every girl. Alex pretending he wanted Constance, Constance thinking of Colin as she danced with Robin. It was very difficult being a woman.

She turned impatiently in Robin's arms. "Take me to Colin and cut in," she demanded. He looked at her in slight surprise. "I want to tell him something," she urged, panic in her eyes.

Robin led them in improvised step towards Colin and his partner. Constance was deliberate in her touch on Colin's arm as Robin obediently cut in. "Take me," she said absently, as if it really didn't matter much who she was with so long as she was in motion.

"You're very unusual, aren't you?" Colin said. "You either want to fly or dance or do something else again all the time, don't you?" His eyes held only severe indulgence as she looked steadily into them trying to break his restraint. They were both so young, she reflected. She was twenty-three and said to be beautiful. He was rich by inheritance, handsome and not over thirty.

When the music died she said she wanted to drive terribly fast into the night. Colin said he would try to find someone who liked that sort of thing, and almost escaped. "With you," she added in time. "Perpetual motion," he said witheringly and took her into the garden outside, high above the city.

He said, "Don't you ever like being quiet—staring hard and seeing nothing?" and to please him she said breathlessly, "Too breathlessly she considered, "Yes," and so they were very still.

When he spoke it was peculiarly unintrusive on the night's stillness! "Say something after me, will you?" She was about to say, "Anything," but glanced at him in what she thought might be a subtle mood. He was looking hard at her and she would not meet his eyes.

"I Constance take thee Colin," he began. She knew that he must discover the tremor of her lips so she spoke to hide it: "I Constance take thee Colin," she faltered in a whisper. He went on, dictating the entire promise to her and her voice grew vibrant as she followed him.

The kiss was so urgent in his eyes—the kiss she must have. But when he leaned towards her she said, "I want to hear you repeat it all for me!" And he did this with something unforgettable in his voice. This was indeed their marriage. Nothing could take it away from her.

Suddenly she remembered—there was Alex—that was liking—that was Robin—that was caring. Now there was Colin and without any kiss at all, except his eyes, this was loving.

He said, "You won't believe me—but it's the first time. When I was a kid something happened between my mother and my father that made me like that. Somehow I've always wanted to wait until after marriage. Until we were both sure. And that's why we promised just now."

"Yes," she said quietly. "I know. And that's why it will still be—after marriage."
