Luise Rainer's Genius Unique Says Director

Richard Thorpe Avers "Toy Wife" Star Is Exception To All Rules

The man who directed Luise Rainer in her latest starring vehicle contends that the actress' genius is the genius of pure inspiration. He is Richard Thorpe, who directed the Academy Award winner in "The Toy Wife," romance of old New Orleans, which opens Sunday at the Roxy Theatre for a three-day shownig.

Luise Rainer draws on some hidden source of inspiration within her and she lends inspiration to everyone around her," declared the director in a recent interview. "She has her pet mannerisms and tricks of expression, of course, but so has every great actor and actress. In Miss Rainer's case, her trick usually consists of a sudden lowering of the voice to lend emphasis. But this is no more unique with her than it was with the renowned Mrs. Leslie Carter.

"Timing is almost the only item I have to watch in directing her," he continued. "She will never question any instruction so long as she understands the reason for it. Her most frequent remark is 'Why?' But once told, she's quite satisfied.

"There's a line in the script of 'The Toy Wife' which describes its heroine as a rainbow. That describes Miss Rainer, too. She flashes every hue and she's as changeable as sunlight through rain. If she has any so-called temperament I have yet to see it displayed. She's exceedingly intelligent and exceedingly charming to work with.

"The one quality which seems to differentiate her from many another star is that ability to draw on hidden springs of inspiration whenever the occasion demands that extra 'finish' and emotional vitality. That's what made her the first person ever to win an Academy acting award two years in succession. Her very presence in a picture could make any director a success."
