A Farm Plan Across the Sea

By HARLEY L. LUTZ
Professor of Public Finance, Princeton University

(Special Correspondence)
LONDON, England—As soon as the American visitor in England begins to read the English newspapers he learns that the English have an agricultural problem, and he immediately feels at home. The only difference is that the English problem is stated as the exact reverse of our own. In the United States, we are troubled by production, and the major contribution of our agricultural system has been the insidious way devised to reduce output while paying the farmers more for producing less. In England the complaint is that production is declining, and support is being drummed up for some policy that will stimulate a larger total crop.

The pro-farm group of politicians are playing up the importance of agricultural capacity for defense purposes. It is true that if the land were to be absolutely neglected, a sudden natural increase of production could not be obtained in case of a blockade. But England's defense rests also on munitions, for supplying which the sea lanes must be kept open. If this is done, food as well as munition materials can be imported.

Beyond doubt, the country can produce more foodstuffs than at present. The real issue is the price that is proper to pay for the increase. The preferred plan to induce the desired result is a higher tariff. The political trouble in the case is that the tariff would be taken from the farmer, the wheat from America and the beef from Argentina until rising prices would call forth greater home productions of these articles.
