Cranberry Growing In The Northwest

in the twelvemonth. He works, talks, and goes about his business, seemingly unaware of the falling rain. A New Englander "blasts" the extremes of his weather, but no true son or daughter of Washington or Oregon seems to want to know nor care what his average rainfall is.

Everything is green, a vivid, hard green, around the residents of these states most of the year. There is a rank, almost tropical excessiveness of growth, moss hangs weirdly from the branches of the gigantic trees in the deep forests. In the summer in Oregon, during the dry season, when the humidity happens to be very low, however, the country is like tinder. They call it "explosive," ripe for gigantic forest fires like the one in 1938, which destroyed practically the entire town of Bandon.

Cranberry Growing The high barrier of the Cascade range at the back door of the narrow coastal region in both these states where cranberries are grown shuts in the rain and shelters the region, making it a conservatory for the development of plant life. East of the Cascades all is different and there is desert and sagebrush, extremes of hot and cold, and great snows and droughts. The cleavage is dramatically abrupt.

In this Pacific Northwest is now fruiting the "Go West, Young Man, Go West" theory of more than a century. The Western states, Washington, Oregon (and California) have had the greatest recent rapid growth in population, the greatest increase in wealth of any portion of the United States. It is the last frontier in the country. There is a constant infusion of new blood, and here reigns the daring spirit of the pioneer.

Its people are justly proud of their new country—they are proud to tell you of its undeniably great advantages, of its rapid progress. They are the acme of hospitality and of kindness. They are alert. They look ahead, not back.

Here now is the freshness of spirit of those developing an industry new to them. They have enthusiasm. Cranberry growing is but a very small part of the great agricultural development of the Northwest, it is perfectly true, but it is with this portion, the interest of growers of the older cranberry region lies. Very recently this region has been directly linked with cranberry culture along the Atlantic coast and Wisconsin, through the coming of Cranberry Canneries, providing a market for canning fruit and for fresh fruit through the American Cranberry Exchange. The industry now has direct hook-up, from the easternmost bog on Cape Cod to the new cranberry bog of the Uranns at Cape Blanco in Oregon, the farthest point west one may drive in the United States. Facilities in common are now provided from the cannery at Plymouth Rock to a cannery in Washington and Oregon, where the waves of the Pacific wash beneath the window.

The different conditions of the Pacific Northwest for cranberry growing work out, as might be expected, as advantages and sometimes disadvantages. In spending a little more than a week in the most intensive kind of visiting much was seen and learned, but at the same time much was missed and some things may have been interpreted ineptly. A thoroughly complete picture of cranberry growing in two great states along a stretch of 500 miles from north to south cannot be gained in such a brief time.

Of my admiration for the kindness, hospitality and enthusiasm of our Pacific Coast cranberry neighbors there is no limit. If, in the series of articles to come, misstatements are made, I ask not only the forgiveness of these fine friends I made, but ask also that they correct any such. After all, what is desired is an accurate picture of over-all cranberry growing—for the benefit of growers whose bogs lie along the Atlantic coast, where Americans have lived the longest, those in the wonderful midwest cranberry state of Wisconsin, and those in the this newest cranberry area where the roar of the restless Pacific is heard above the hiss of sprinkler systems. From coast to coast now stretches cranberry growing. So, as a preliminary to the subsequent articles, a sincere salute to this new cranberry country—a salute to their future, and in pioneer country anything may happen.

BATTLE CRY

CHINESE SOLDIERS have a battle cry: "Gung-Ho!" Literally translated, means "Working together!" In Americanese, it means Teamwork. And Teamwork is a word every American understands—in peacetime as in war. In this war, it means perfect understanding among our Government, our service men, our home front. It means our confidence in our fighters' ability. It means their faith in us to provide the material to do the job. It means buying War Bonds, And a very good buy they are, too. For every three dollars we invest in War Bonds, Uncle Sam promises four back in ten years. There's no more honorable promise in the world! Buy War Bonds. They're a wonderful investment—for you as well as America!

Let's all KEEP BACKING THE ATTACK! Coquille Valley Sentinel
