Airline Travel Expected To Gain 300 Per Cent After War

Travel by air on regularly scheduled routes operated by air lines of the United States will triple next year, according to a balancing by the Air Transport Association of the calculations made by agencies whose business requires them to plan for the future, according to an announcement from Washington, D. C. The volume of traffic in 1944 was an all-time high in spite of shortages of planes and man-power and other war-time obstacles. But the estimates by experts as to what we may expect beginning in 1946 go far beyond what last year's figures in themselves might indicate.

Here is what the consensus contemplates: Six billion passenger miles in 1946, as compared with the current two and a quarter billion.

A quarter million air travelers to Europe per year soon after the end of the war.

Eight to twelve thousand pilot and crew members employed by the airlines, supported by 125,000 airline workers on the ground, or three times the present payroll.

On the airports 63,000 operations jobs, plus 125,000 jobs directly connected with airport activities.

All first class mail dispatched by air and the air carriers delivering parcel post. The volume of air express exceeding passenger revenue. Nearly six million potential new air travelers as the result of war experiences connected with flying. These are not the dreams of an air-minded Jules Verne. They are factual surveys made by the Civil Aeronautics Administration of the United States government.
