MASTITIS TAKES 25% MILK OUTPUT TOLL

It is estimated that mastitis or udder garget is costing dairy farmers $100,000,000 yearly and in some areas nearly 25% of dairy herds are affected by it.

A common cause of mastitis is a chain-like germ (Streptococcus agalactiae) which may lie hidden in the udders of cows for months, or even years. Then, suddenly, it multiplies rapidly and produces irreparable damage to the delicate lining membranes of the cow's udder.

The disease may be either acute, with high fever and subsequent death, or a chronic, slow-going tissue change that ruins the cow's usefulness. Not all mastitis is caused by this particular "strep" germ. Sometimes serious outbreaks are due to "staph-type" germs—the variety responsible for boils and abscesses.

Fortunately, veterinarians have developed accurate methods for picking out the cows which harbor the offending germs. Special chemical solutions have also been perfected which will free cows from infection when introduced into the udder vault by a special injection method. Precautionary measures include disposal of untreatable cows, milking infected cows last, sterilization of milking machines and cups, so-called strip-cup testing, and cow stable hygiene.

Combating mastitis will pay the farmer real dividends, because garget-free herds produce as much as 20 percent more milk than diseased herds.
