

Farm Trends In Nation Shown In Economic Report

Several important factors related to the agricultural outlook are set forth in the mid-year economic report of the president to congress, says L. R. Breithaupt, extension agricultural economist at Oregon State college. The report is the second to be transmitted in accordance with the Employment Act of 1946 and was prepared with the assistance of the Council of Economic Advisers and other government agencies.

The report states that "in view of the existing uncertainties in the farm outlook it is the duty of food growers, processors, and the government to keep the public currently informed of the real facts concerning our food supply." One such fact is that there is "no general or present scarcity of farm and food products as a whole." Despite prospects for a smaller corn crop than the very large crop of 1946, "we may still obtain a total agricultural output as large as last year," the report says.

After pointing out that we are at a record high point in civilian production with 60 million civilian jobs filled, only 2 1/2 million workers unemployed and various other evidences of prosperity, warnings are sounded. According to the report "The unprecedented prosperity of our nation must not be a cause for idle self-congratulation." It says that we must remember that full employment at a high price level is being sustained by temporary props, such as, (1) reconversion demands of business; (2) backlog demands of consumers; (3) extensive use of savings and credits; and (4) an extraordinary excess of exports over imports.

As these props grow weaker, there will be need of many economic readjustments to attain a peace-time economy that is stable at a maximum level. These adjustments take time, but must be made before the lack of them results in serious unemployment and business decline, the report says.

The report adds that food exports helped boost prices, but that U. S. exports of all goods the first half of 1947 ran at a rate over a billion dollars a month in excess of imports. About half of the deficit was financed by the government. This prop is one that may weaken as the months go by.

Bangs Disease National Health Threat

BANGS DISEASE 2 col. 28 pt.
Today the major unbeatable livestock disease of the United States is disease or still earlier, contagious brucellosis, formerly called Bang's abortion, Dr. C. R. Donham, head of veterinary science at Purdue university and former member of the O.S.C. staff, declared while attending the recent western states extension conference at Corvallis.

"Animal health is a commodity, purchasable like other commodities," Dr. Donham explained. "There is a great stock of exact knowledge about this disease. Given the mandate to eradicate it, my profession has the know-how to do the job."

Dr. Donham emphasized that the American people purchased health when, during the last three decades, they supported a program to wipe out the menace of bovine tuberculosis. There is just as much or more reason for the same support to brucellosis eradication, he said as it is a major threat to the health of all people, especially those living in rural areas.

From 5 to 15 percent of persons in selected areas studied suffer from diseases caused by the germ of brucellosis in domestic animals, sometimes referred to as undulant fever in humans, Dr. Donham stated on authority of recent medical research. Various obscure diseases, nervous troubles and premature aging are found in animals, he said.

The Journal of the American Medical association recently stated that an average of 4000 persons in the U. S. each year are infected with brucellosis, and that these represent only the severe cases. Probably from 40,000 to 100,000 infections occur annually, the Journal estimated.

Added to the menace to human health is the terrific economic loss from the disease, Dr. Donham added. While the loss of aborted calves is the most apparent, it is not the major loss, he said. Infected dairy herds often have milk production cut as much as 24 percent. A study in Michigan shows that the average infected cow produces about 2065 fewer pounds of milk per lactation than a healthy cow. In Michigan alone the disease also causes an estimated annual loss of nearly 8 million pounds of beef veal.

University Registration Set For Sept. 15

UNIVERSITY OF OREGON, Eugene, August 21 (Special) — Fall term registration for both old and new students in the University of Oregon has been announced by Registrar Curtis E. Avery for the week of September 15 to 20.

New students are asked to be on the campus Sunday, September 14, for a mass meeting, when the registration procedure will be explained and when the appointments are to be given out. These appointments, Mr. Avery explains, are made previously on the basis of the returned enrollment cards. Enrollment cards are sent to all new students admitted and to all old students who were registered in the university during the spring term. At the time these cards are filled out and returned to the registrar's office the appointment for the individual is recorded. It is very important, he emphasizes, that these cards be returned as soon as possible.

Appointments start Monday morning, and continue through the week with both old and new students being registered during the period.

Under a new plan this year health examination blanks are being sent to all new students, to be taken to the family doctor for filling out. This is done with the feeling that the family doctor, knowing the background of the individual, can necessarily give a more comprehensive examination and analysis. Formerly the health examination was a part of registration week. This health blank is to be brought to the campus by new students and filed as a part of their registration procedure.

Printers' Union Meets With Court

Members of the typographical union met at the county courthouse Monday morning to request that all county printing be kept within Coos county. In the discussion it was also brought out that they would demand later perhaps that all printing done for Coos county bear the union shop label.

The county court informed the union spokesmen that they were interested in seeing that printing be kept in Coos county and all department heads re-affirmed their stand to keep county printing at home.

New Advertising Series Starts

"You'd Be Surprised" is the new theme for a series of advertisements that are scheduled to run in The Sentinel under the sponsorship of Annie Smith Insurance Agency.

These unusual and catchy ads were purchased from a large feature company by the local insurance agency and the first of the series is in this week's Sentinel. The answers to the unbelievable questions can be learned by dropping in at the office of the insurance agency in the Roxy building.

Each week a different "You'd Be Surprised" cartoon and question will appear and each one of the answers will be displayed at the insurance agency's office.
