Permanent Operations By Weyerhaeuser Will Add Payrolls, Extend Plants in '49

Further progress toward Weyerhaeuser Timber company's goal to insure its permanent operation was indicated today in the firm's annual report.

This report reiterates the company's determination to build for the future through the operation of tree farms in Oregon and Washington, by diversifying its manufacturing, grouping its processing plants, and developing new products and permanent markets.

In the annual report, J. P. Weyerhaeuser, Jr., president of the company, commented on the changes in the price trend during 1948.

"During the first three months of 1948," he said, "we extended to retailers a ten per cent reduction in prices of lumber for home construction, although this failed to affect the booming market. It might be fairly said, however, that our restraint in pulp prices did help to hold the inflation line.

"In the latter part of 1948, buyer discrimination in many fields became more and more evident. Hesitation translated itself eventually into sharp price reductions for lumber and plywood.

"In spite of the break in the price level late in the year," continued Weyerhaeuser, 1948 produced large earnings measured in terms of the current dollar. The lowered purchasing power of the 1948 dollar was perhaps best evidenced to the company by the fact that during the year it actually reinvested in plant additions and improvements more than the total net earnings of the company for the year."

Net income for the year was reported at $25,962,537, or $8.49 per share. A total of $31,576,185 was spent on plant and vessel additions and replacements. Major expenditures were: for logging facilities, a sawmill, and a container board mill at Springfield, Oregon; for a sulphate pulp mill and expansion of the plywood plant at Longview, Washington; for the construction of logging truck roads at Coos Bay, Oregon, and for two cargo vessels.

Dividends of $3 per share, the same as in 1947, were paid. The company's annual report revealed a strengthening of total working capital position. As of last December 31, working capital was $15,311,735 a year ago.
