Governor McKay Says • • •

You would have to hunt a long time and range far afield to find a more appropriate slogan than that adopted for the tenth annual National Newspaper Week, October 1 to 8: "Freedom Goes Where the Newspaper Goes."

Those six words testify to the impact of an unfettered press with a force and clarity no flow of prose or oratory could match. They say, in effect, that newspapers which speak honestly without fear of censorship, and people who have earned the same liberty of expression are invariably found together. Where you have one, you automatically have the other. One brings the other about and demands its perpetuation with no strings attached.

Any man in the public eye should welcome the justified criticism of the press. It stands for reassurance that the processes by which he attained official stature are safeguarded by enlightened public opinion that is constantly refreshed by the vigilant reporter and editorial writer. Hence, the dailies and weeklies of Oregon and the other 47 states are really crusading for better government as they discharge their obligation to inform and educate their readers.

Certain unfortunate countries deny their newspapers and their citizens the right to give and receive this vital service. I, personally, would want no part of the life of those countries.

DOUGLAS MCKAY, Governor.
