Building permanent markets for our pulp

PULP is a basic material—just as pig iron is. Processors use it to make a wide variety of useful products. You may be WEARING a pulp product in the form of rayon. The food you buy is PACKED in a box or cellophane made of pulp. Certainly the paper in the books and magazines you read had its beginnings in the forests.

In one form or another, America uses millions of tons of pulp. The market is tremendous, and there are scores of pulp producers to supply manufacturers of papers, boxes, rayons, cellophane and lacquers.

We try to build permanent markets for our pulp in many ways: First, by rigidly adhering to customers' specifications—making exactly the quality required to meet each need. This is the job of a large staff of skilled chemists. Second, sales and service offices are maintained in New York, Boston and Chicago. Most manufacturers who use pulp are located near these cities. Third, by efficient, integrated plant operation we are able to meet competitive prices. Fourth, our tree farms help guarantee an endless supply of fine pulp to our customers. And, looking to the future, a staff of chemists and engineers are steadily developing new uses for cellulose and lignin—and better ways to produce them.

Steady operation of our pulp, lumber and other forest products plants depends entirely upon the continuous purchases by our customers. We must "serve well to survive" in the free American market, because satisfied customers are the ONLY source of income to meet payrolls, pay taxes and earn profits.
