Found Plenty of Moonshine

Investigating officers were puzzled for a time when they searched the some of Minelo Camalo at Bay Park for signs and evidence of moonshining and found none, says the Coos Bay Harbor. They found, however, papers from which raisins had been taken and this gave the idea they aken and this gave the idea they were still on the right scent.

They found a beaten path leading away into the woods, and following this, they came to a water supply from which there was a hole, evidently fitting a pipe. Further search of the gulch disclosed therein, and near the water, three barrels of raisin mash well on the way to maturity. This mush had been securely covered so that no dirt might leak into it, and buried in the ground. buried in the ground.

Ensilage and Alfalfa

The eastern Oregon experiment station of O. A. C. has demonstrated that steers fattened on alfalfa hay and easilage made practically twice the gain made by those fattened on hay alone in the usual manner. This gain was made without any advance in cost per day of fattening. Details of this experiment may be obtained in bulletin No. 174, just issued.
