A Japanese Suicide

On Monday evening at about 8 o'clock, Mino, one of the Japanese section crew at this place evidently committed suicide at the mouth of Cunningham creek, a mile below town. At that time Gene Wickham, Hal Pierce and Tracy Leach, three of our school boys were near the spot fishing, when they heard a splash in the river. The first thought of the boys was that a piece of the river bank had fallen in, but at once they heard other splashing and gurgling sounds, when they ran with their lantern and saw the man's head just above water in the river. At this moment two young men were coming up the track, to whom the boys called, and who got into a boat which was there and brought Mino near enough that Wickham and Pierce reached him and pulled him partly onto the shore, when they noticed he was bleeding. The idea of a murder occurred to the boys who left the body which by this time appeared lifeless, and hurried to town and notified Marshal Goodman and Nightwatch Gage, who with others hurried back, but the body was gone, having slid back into the river.

From the other members of the crew we learn that the deceased had been ill, and that he had started off without making any explanation as to where he was going, and from his actions in a general way, have reached the conclusion that it is a plain case of suicide. The body has not yet been recovered up to this writing.

The hat and a razor belonging to Mino were found on the river bank where considerable blood was noticeable on the grass. The contents of a note found in his room, indicated that he contemplated self destruction when he started away, in which he requested that his letters, pictures, etc., be sent to Japan, and closing with a good bye.

There is good prospects of a college being located at Myrtle Point. W. R. Miller, of Wedderburn, was here Wednesday looking for a suitable site, and incidentally informing the faculty decided on Myrtle Point because of the anti-saloon sentiment and if Myrtle Point keeps out the saloon the school will no doubt come here; otherwise it may go to some other town. Business men here think most favorably of the proposition and will do everything possible to secure the institution which is of more importance than all other things combined.—Myrtle Point Enterprise.

A suitable reward will be paid the finder of a large leather pocket-book belonging to Walter Sinclair.
