a late arrival from Portland, having taken over the plant, will be its publisher in the future. Having been in the work of publishing this paper almost constantly for more than twenty-eight years, it is deemed advisable to make a change for ourselves, while other members of the family are desirous of residing elsewhere for a time at least Portland being the objective point at present.

We desire here to express our gratitude to our friends and patrons for past favors, and trust that Mr. Urdike will be accorded even greater consideration. He is a thorough newspaper man, a practical printer and publisher of experience whom we feel perfectly safe in giving the highest recommendations to our friends.

C. O. DRYDEN.

Christmas has come and passed, leaving memories of that memorable day deeply impressed upon the minds of the little folks of all civilized countries. Christmas trees were enjoyed in nearly all the churches in this city besides many homes. The one at the South Methodist church has elicited a great amount of comment, the tree, or trees, being arranged in a very beautiful manner. There were about a dozen of the trees, arranged along the curved edges of two crescent-shaped platforms, and slightly leaning to a common center, and these platforms were movable and were set with the opening between them pointing toward the audience. This gave the trees the appearance of one large tree.
The decorations were all placed on the inside of the circle, and when the audience appeared in the church, the tree gave the appearance of being perfectly bare, which caused many disappointed looks, but as the time arrived for the distribution of presents, a great number of electric lights among the trees were turned on, and two persons who were out of sight operated the platforms, which were drawn apart at a point toward the audience, opening the trees up like a huge book as it were, leaving Santa Claus standing in the center, and exposing the sides of the trees bearing the decoration and presents. It was in deed a beautiful sight.

Died.

ment took place in the Masonic cemetery at this place. The cause of death was a complication of troubles from which she had been a sufferer all her life. The remains were followed to their last resting place by a large number of friends. Her parents have the sympathy of all.
