An English Appreciation Of Theodore Roosevelt

(From an article in the Saturday Review, London, on his account of his explorations in the Brazilian wilderness, appearing in Scribner's Magazine.)

"The truth is that 'the Colonel,' as American journalists love to call him, is a man not to be measured by an inch-tape. He belongs to the tiny minority for whom our common rules fail to provide. His type was never very common, and is all but extinct. Old Greece and Old Rome knew the breed well. It thrived in Renaissance Europe. Elizabethan England produced some of its finest examples. Its main characteristic is an insatiable appetite, an immense gust for life. It wants to taste every experience, and is not content with a sip only, but quaffs the goblet in great satisfying gulps. It finds equal joy in a Court cabal, in the sober work of administration, in the writing of a sonnet, in the fighting of a duel. In fact, all life is a duel to a man of this kind.

"He attacks a Greek philosopher in the same spirit that he fights a Spanish galleon, or leads an exploring party through antres vast and deserts idle. And he will never lack adventures. He will find them at the Capitol or at the British Local Government Board in the twentieth century just as easily as on the Spanish Main in the sixteenth. In most strange modern guise Mr. Roosevelt is really a spiritual brother to Walter Raleigh. He is gentlemanly and adventurous to the finger tips. Fighting Spaniards in Cuba, or trust bosses in New York, hunting big game in East Africa, flourishing the 'big stick' of the Monroe doctrine, giving 'Bull Moose' election speeches for three months on end, decreeing the 'nu spelling' or laying down the law to 'race suicides,' Mr. Roosevelt is the fighting man, with whom the joy of battle is the main thing, and the causes belli a matter of secondary importance. It is the tame, home-keeping man's failure to understand the Roosevelt type that leads him to giggle over foolish depreciation of the ex-President's exploring feats. The Scotts, the Shackletons, the Seton-Karrs—approved and accredited voyagers in the inane—these everybody understands. But that a man shall one day be head of a great State, another day eagerly writing articles and books, and yet again setting out lightly heartedly on a dangerous excursion into the unknown—'jumping at the chance'—this is something quite outside ordinary experience, and the assumption that the exploration was after all nothing but a mere holiday jaunt is welcomed by people who feel their own manhood affronted by Mr. Roosevelt's extraordinary powers of body and mind. There is no excuse for maintaining this grudging and foolish attitude.
