POULTRY GOSSIP.

When a rainstorm comes up the chicks should be called to the coops and kept in till the weather clears up, or there will be bad results later.

Two thirds of the cases of ailments in poultry during June can be traced to vermin.

The owner of a fine lot of growing chicks at this season has much at stake. He must be ever on the alert and leave nothing to chance.

Look for lice in the poultry house. While that should be the order throughout the entire year, it seems to be most important right now.

Do a lot of trapping these days. Find out the best layers. Put a leg band on them and use them for your breeders next season.

BREEDS OF FOWLS THAT MAKE BEST CAPONS

The best fowls for caponizing are the large, rapid growing breeds such as the Plymouth Rock, Rhode Island Red, Wyandotte, Orpington and Brahma. The latter breed is used by specialists in capon growing. It is sometimes crossed with the Plymouth Rock breed. Very often the cross makes a capon weighing twelve to fifteen pounds. However, the smaller birds, such as Plymouth Rock, weighing from six to nine pounds when eight months old, are more in demand. It is uncertain and not desirable for the average person to cross breed. Plymouth Rock capons grow fast, have a large breast, and the desirable yellow skin legs. Then, too, Plymouth Rock pullets which can be conveniently raised at the same time are good layers and early maturing, combined with good weight when killed.

The caponizing operation is simple and can be done by the farmer with a little practice. A good set of instruments may be purchased directly from manufacturers of surgical instruments or through poultry supply dealers. Complete directions for caponizing are furnished with the instruments. Essential for a successful operation is that the birds are of the right size and properly starved. Good light is needed when making the cut. The best time to caponize is when the fowls are about three months of age, but the farmer is governed to a large extent by the size, about 1 1/2 pounds being the right weight.

Poultry experts claim that one great mistake in raising capons is in marketing them too early and in having them too lean. After caponizing they suggest they reach full size, which will take from ten to twelve months, and then fatten them. This is good advice. Contrary to the popular theory, a capon as placed on the market is usually little, if any, larger than it would have been if the operation of caponizing had not been performed. The illustration shows a bunch of White Plymouth Rock capons.

Previous to the operation the cockerels are starved for at least twenty-four hours to empty the intestines so the testicles can be easily seen and removed. After the operation the fowls are given a moist mash. In a few days they require no extra attention except the pricking of the wind blisters once or twice. They are allowed free range and are fed plenty of grain to develop a large frame. It will do no harm to run them with the pullets as their disposition is entirely changed. Capons do not fight or crow and are easy to handle. About three weeks before they are to be marketed they are shut in a pen and fed a moist mash twice a day composed of 20 per cent bran, 10 per cent wheat middlings, 10 per cent alfalfa meal, 20 per cent ground oats, 20 per cent corn meal and 20 per cent beef scrap, mixed with skimmed milk. The mash is supplemented with cracked corn and wheat fed at noon. Late winter is the time to market capons, when they bring high prices.

Liver Trouble of Fowls.

Now and then you will find the comb of a fowl to turn dark in color. The usual cause of this is indigestion or liver trouble, which produces a singular movement of the blood. By cutting down the quantity of food given the condition may be righted. Serious liver trouble comes from overfeeding as well as from underfeeding.—Kansas Farmer.

An Incident of the Boxer Movement in China

By JOHN Y. LARNED

Some years ago Hugh Worthington, a young man of fortune, desiring to enter the field of diplomacy, secured an appointment in the service of the United States government at Peking. Worthington was more interested in seeing the country than in his official duties, which were nominal, and he traveled over such parts of China as were open to foreigners. One day he fell in with a mandarin who had been a good deal in England and spoke the language. The mandarin traveled in style, being carried in a chair, common in Europe until near the beginning of the nineteenth century, by two men and attended by several other servants.

Worthington, who traveled on horseback, on leaving the mandarin rode beside the chair, chatting with him. The American knew enough of China to understand that it was infested with robbers and was armed to the teeth. The mandarin was an elderly person, unused to arms, but his servants were prepared to defend him. They were armed with pikes, short swords and other weapons, which Worthington considered next to useless in a fight with an enemy properly accoutred.

Suddenly while passing through a narrow cut in the road the party was attacked by a dozen men bent on robbery. They were not much better armed than the mandarin's servants, but they outnumbered the latter, who immediately took to flight, leaving their master in the hands of the enemy.

Worthington drew a revolver from under his coat at each hip and began a fusillade that put the robbers to flight. Upon this the servants returned and humbly begged the master's forgiveness for having deserted him. He was profuse in his thanks to the American, who had not only saved a considerable amount of money for the Chinaman, but his life as well. He begged Worthington to name some favor that he could do him, but the latter said that he wanted for nothing in the world. Then the mandarin took up a bamboo umbrella and opened it. Calling for a writing stick, he wrote on it something as unintelligible to the preserver as the receipt of a Chinese laundryman in America. Handling it to Worthington, he said in a voice so low as not to be heard by his servants: "A time is coming when there will be a movement on the part of our ignorant and superstitious people to rid China of all foreigners. Know this umbrella and if attacked open it in the face of your would be murderer."

Worthington paid no attention to the man's warning. Every one knew that foreigners were hated by the Chinese, and there had always been talk about the latter being massacred. The American was young, and the young take little thought of danger. But he was too polite not to assure the mandarin that he would keep his gift as a remembrance of him and the episode.

An American named Preston lived in Peking, who operated a banking house which was a branch of one in New York. Worthington spent a good deal of time at his house, attracted by the banker's daughter, Emma Preston. When the Boxer trouble broke out a month after the foregoing episode Worthington was at Preston's house. It was without the regions of the embassies and entirely unprotected. Worthington on the first sign of danger returned to the embassy for leave to absent himself for the protection of the family in which he was interested. Having attained it, he was about to start back when he noticed the umbrella given him by the mandarin. The day was very hot and it occurred to him to take it for protection against the sun's rays. As to the words spoken concerning it if attacked by an enemy, he had forgotten them, but he did not forget to take with him a couple of revolvers and a supply of cartridges.

As Worthington approached the Preston home he noticed knots of Chinamen talking together excitedly. Some of them scowled at him, but since they had as much dread as hatred of a "foreign devil" they did not attack him. He reached the Preston home safely, but found the family in great trepidation, expecting that at any time a mob would attack and murder them. The anticipated trouble occurred the next day. The banker's residence was well known, and a crowd of Chinamen armed with all sorts of implements from a scythe to a razor came down for murder. Worthington knew that, though armed, he could not withstand so large a force; nevertheless he stationed himself at a window over the front door, ready to use up his cartridges.

The howling mass came, stopped before the house and were about to make an onslaught upon it when suddenly all their eyes were cast to a window directly beneath the one Worthington occupied. Then every weapon was lowered, every knife was sheathed and the Chinamen moved on.

Worthington was at a loss to account for this sudden change, but it was soon explained to him. One of the family had caught up his umbrella, as a drowning person will catch at a straw, opened it and held it at a window on the ground floor as a protection against stones that were being thrown in. On it was a message signed by a man to whom the Boxers looked as a commander: "Respect this man and his family and his property."

III--Telegraph and Telephone

Our transportation facilities are the most perfect product of this great commercial age and the telegraph and telephone systems of this nation crown the industrial achievements of its whole world. These twin messengers of modern civilization, born in the skies, stand today the most faithful and efficient public servants that ever toiled for the human race.

They are of American nativity and while warm from the mind of the inventive genius have, under American supervision, spun a net-work of wires across the earth and under the seas. Telegraphy, in its early youth, mastered the known world and the telephone has already conquered the earth's surface, and now stands at the seashore ready to leap across the ocean.

No industry in the history of the world has ever made such rapid strides in development and usefulness, and none has ever exerted a more powerful influence upon the civilization of its day than the Telegraph and Telephone. Their achievement demonstrates the supremacy of two distinct types of American genius—invention and organization.

The industry was peculiarly fortunate in having powerful inventive intellect at its source and tremendous minds to direct its organization and growth. It is the most perfect fruit of the tree of American industry and when compared with its European contemporaries, it thrills every patriotic American with pride.

Ambitious youth can find no more in-springing company than the fellowship of the giant intellects that constructed this marvelous industry and a journey along the pathway of its development, illuminated at every mile-post of its progress by the lightning-flashes of brilliant minds, will be taken at a very early date.

A brief statistical review of the industry brings out its growth and magnitude in a most convincing and unforgettable manner.

The telephone service of the United States is the most popular and efficient and its rates are the cheapest of the telephone systems of the world.

We are the greatest talkers on earth. We send 60 per cent of our communications over the telephone. The world has about 15,000,000 telephones and of this number the United States has approximately 9,540,000, Europe 4,020,000 and other countries 1,300,000. According to the latest world telephone census, the total world wire telephone mileage is 33,262,000 miles divided as follows: United States 20,248,000, Europe 10,335,000, and other countries 2,679,000. About six per cent of the world's population and sixty-one per cent of the telephone wire mileage is in the United States.

Freddy turned to his brother and grinned. "Eh, James," he said, "the lad thinks it's Christmas."—Everybody's.
