She was unselfish. Her hands were hard from serving others; her limbs were often weary from bearing others' burdens. But of these things she made were often weary from bearing others' burdens. My duties as circuit judge have been performed largely in Coos county, my home, where I have lived nearly all my life time, and I am constrained to believe that the people of this county who know me best and have known me longest, register ed their approval of my official conduct when they gave me at the primary election in 1910, a larger vote than any other candidate for any State or District nomination; and my ome county gave me nearly twice as many votes as were given any other candidate for this nomination or any ticket.

The office of circuit judge carries with it great responsibilities and difficult duties, and in Coos county alone, at each of the three annual sessions, the docket usually contains not less than two hundred and fifty cases, many of which involve the determinations of numerous motions and demurrers in addition to the final hearing of the case upon its merits. In addition to the work within my own district, I have been many time called to other counties of the State to hear and determine difficult and unpleasant cases. In no instance have I hesitated to hear and determine
