Who's Guilty?

A certain Coquille merchant in discussing the mail order problem last week said it was his opinion that nearly as much money was sent out to mail order houses each month as was spent in Coquille. Probably this was an exaggeration; but the merchant had some grounds for his statement. "We cannot compete with these houses in prices," he continued, "they sell in such amounts as to enable them to buy in large quantities and to sell cheaper."

In that sentence the merchant summed up the whole matter. If the home merchant sold more goods; if he was able to turn over his stock oftener, he would be able to buy more advantageously, have his goods come in larger consignments and therefore sell at a price more nearly equalling that of the mail order house.

It is the man who patronizes the mail order house that causes the one who buys at home to pay high prices. Buy at home and help toward lower prices.
