The hunting season closed yesterday on ducks. It was one of the poorest seasons in the valley that hunters have ever known. While thousands of ducks have been on the Bay all winter there wasn't one here where there was fifty in recent years. The hunters blame this fact to the good weather we have enjoyed this winter. Another winter like the present one and there will be lots of shotguns for sale. At a rough estimate 250 ducks have fallen to the hunters in the valley while on the Bay thousands have been killed.

What Four Panthers Did In Two Weeks

By Warden J. M. Thomas in The Oregon Sportsman

A year or so ago, I was making my rounds in Coos County trying to learn the conditions of the different game districts, to get acquainted with the people and see how they felt toward the protection of game and the game laws.

I stopped over night with an old man who had lived in that district for a long time. I told him my business and asked his opinion on a number of things. He said: "I am in favor of protecting insectivorous song birds and would like to see Chinese pheasants get a good start, but there is no use in protecting deer. It would be best to turn the people loose and let them kill the deer as fast as they can and get some benefit of them; at the present time the pesky panther gets them all." I asked him how he knew they got them all, and he replied, "Why, if four panthers will kill eighteen deer in twelve days, how many will they kill in a year? And if you don't believe me, go to Rowland Prairie and get Jack Warner to go with you and look for yourself."

So I went to Mr. Warner's and as he had no evidence as to this story. He said: "Well, I think I have enough to convince you of the number of panthers without going very far."

So he took me into a shed where four panther pelts were tacked on the wall, two very large ones and two about half grown. (This was in March and the two small ones were probably born in May or June, making them almost a year old.) "Well," I said, "Here are the four scalps, where are the carcasses of the eighteen deer?" (pointing to a wooded point near a large prairie), they are all right there on a spot of ground not to exceed four acres, and these pesky devils (pointing to the pelts on the wall) must be responsible as I caught all four of them within a quarter of a mile of that spot—two of them right on the point—and got them all in three hours' time."

He told the following story: "Upon going to the Prairie to look for my cattle, I had to pass very near that point. I took my dogs with me (pointing to a large bluish white-faced dog he called 'Old Grit' and a white and black spotted bitch he called 'Foxy'). As we got near 'Old Grit' scented something and was soon off. We followed and discovered that he had found a deer, buried beneath sticks and leaves, that had been killed perhaps only that night, as none of it had been eaten. In a few minutes the dog left this spot and began smelling around, and suddenly stopped again and began to dig. He found another deer that had just been killed and buried. He did not linger at this spot and was off again on a dead run up the hill. It was beginning to get interesting to me so I followed the dog. He was now barking very loudly and I hastened in his direction to find that he had that devil (pointing to the largest hide) treed in a big fir. Unfortunately I did not have my gun, so I left the dogs in charge and hurried back to the house, a mile away. Upon my return, needless to say, I made peace with that fellow in a very short time."

"Foxy" and I started back toward the deer to look around further and "Old Grit" started in another direction. It was only a few minutes until his loud barking drew us to where he was, and, to my astonishment, if he didn't have one of those little fellows up another tree. I killed it and thought it surely was doing a land office business to have killed two panthers in one day.

"We again went to the place where we had found the deer carcasses. 'Old Grit' came with us this time and the dogs became busy at once digging deer out from most any place, it seemed. Some of them looked as if they had been killed several days, as they were partly eaten—others had hardly been touched. I followed the dogs as they would move from one carcass to another, and suddenly 'Old Grit' scented something and was off again in a minute, 'Foxy' after him. I was lead to them by their barking and found that they had treed the old mother cat up a hemlock. I was not long killing her and felt sure that we had now gotten the whole family of panthers. I felt fine; it was getting late and I did not want to spend the night in a home yard so started home. We had not gone far when the dogs simultaneously scented something and were off again in the same direction. Shortly I heard them bark and knew they had something treed again, but it was now so dark I could not see to shoot. I debated whether to go home for a lantern and return, and decided that I might as well clean up a good day's business. Upon my return with the lantern, I found that the dogs had this other little fellow up a fir snag. I killed him and reached home in fairly good time at that."

I asked, "I suppose you slept good that night with all your excitement?" "Slept good? Why every time I shut my eyes I could see big panthers, small panthers, old panthers, young panthers, over me, under me, why everything was panthers. The next morning we went back to the point and found the carcasses of eighteen deer. Apparently none of them had been killed over ten or twelve days, as they were hardly decayed, but we did not find any more panthers."

So this is the reason the old gentleman wanted the people to have the deer, for certain enough at that rate of slaughter all the deer in this county would not last long. In the last five years, Mr. Warner, with these two dogs, has killed 78 wild cats, 24 panthers and 27 bears. These two dogs are the best in the state and Mr. Warner will put them up against anything in the state for money, marbles or moss agates.
