The French citizen who has been an old resident of Ashland for many years, died at his home on Oak street yesterday afternoon at the age of eighty-six years. He was a native of Quebec, Canada, and came across the plains to Ashland in 1853 with a band of sheep which he was interested in with others, He afterwards carried on a stock-raising business east of Bear creek for a number of years, and also went to the mines in California, but soon came back to Ashland again.

The following concentrates on the latter, who were just beginning to take out pay gravel in their river bar claims, the suddenness of the storm giving them no chance to save any of their wheels. Up on the mountain sides some parties were making shakes, which came within the grasp of the storm and were strewn up and down the gulches. The water covered the fences in the vicinity of Ager. The dam at Klamath City, or Manistee, stood it well, and only received good results from the storm, in the way of filling up the cracks with rubbish and cement, doing a job that otherwise would have cost the company about $200.

Will come along soon enough. Some may say they don't want to work; all right we don't want them for students. But we do want all live, active young men and dry creeks were turned into roaring stream overflowing with water. The Klamath river soon rose to an unusual depth, and the immense volume of water rushing down in its mad fury tore out all the wheels and dams along its course used for irrigating and mining purposes. The loss will fall heaviest on the latter, who were just beginning to take out pay gravel.

Klamath City Doings.

The "Klamath City" boomers are just a little the freshest that have been near here yet. The last number of the "Northwest Magazine," published at Minneapolis by E. V. Smalley, besides a big description of the place contains a birdseye view of a flourishing manufacturing city, single views of the bank, depot, choice bits of scenery, and a number of private residences, making the appearance of the prominent features that would grace a city of 40,000 inhabitants. When it is known that there is very little of that big city is on the scene yet, the nerve of these gentlemen becomes apparent. But just such push is what wins and the company will undoubtedly be successful.

Yesterday morning about six o'clock Otto Shady, who was engaged in digging a well at Manistee, or Klamath City, entered the hole, thirty-nine feet deep, to commence work, but was overcome by foul air. Mr. Pendegast went down the well, put a rope around his waist and drew him up, to all around his waist and drew him up, to all appearances as dead as could be. Efforts at resuscitation were introduced and, to the surprise of everybody, he was brought to

The "West Shore" Outrage The July number of the West Shore is at hand, in which Ashland's illustrations appear. It is a good thing that the cuts are all labeled, so that we all can see that the artist meant this place in them. Had he left out the name of the place people would have thought it was a village in some half civilized country. Ashland, as is universally acknowledged is one of the most picturesque towns in appearance on the coast, but those pict-ures murder it. They look like a lot of barns and outhouses thrown together, and although the town and its surroundings is a continuation of orchards, trees and shrubbery, the engraver shows up only a few things that look like bean poles. Ashland has always had the good will and influence of the S. P. R. R. but when they see the way their fine new depot and hotel is pictured we fear the Dolph Carlton and the Rader Bros., worst.
