On my asking her something as to how she had achieved her success she modestly disclaimed, as do all heroines (and heroes, too), having anything at all to tell. She placed in my hand a bulky pamphlet of some 100 pages on "The Pronunciation of the Greek Aspirates," which was, she said, the dissertation which had been accepted by the examiners. It was, she feared, very little more than a compilation from the ordinary German philological authorities, and she had only been able to work at it during odd times in the intervals of the regular work of her school. The examiners had, as was their usual custom, examined her further upon the subject and had kindly taken care to question her on points which she had not dwelt upon in the dissertation itself.
