Over the People's Heads. The thermometers that mark the temperature of the weather in the United States signal service stations usually record the degrees of heat and cold far above the people's heads. This is a fair sample of much of the so called ntific work of government officials and others The publications of the government in various departments seem to be often purposely clothed in language that it would require an encyclopedia constantly at hand to trans-late into plain English. The bulletins and public documents are too often as far over the people's heads as the government thermometers are.

So far as appears to the plain mind there is only one reason for this. It is that the writers of such documents simply desire to show off their learning So marked has the custom become of
