SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 13,1902 Journal and Baltimore Advertiser.

It was a very wise man who made the remark several years ago relative to locking barns after the horses were stolen. He probably never thought of fires and their disastrous effects at the time he let the term statement fall from his lips or he would have put his aphorism in capital letters.

Anyway Prineville can afford to draw a deep breath and a lesson from the poignant manner in which this old-time sage expressed himself. And just for the sake of il lustration, the fire which the sister town experienced last week can take the place of the barn and the loss which might have accrued from a lack of proper fire facilities can answer the purpose of the horse.

Prineville can thank the weather man who has charge of the air currents that no wind was blowing while the planing-mill was being destroyed. She also has reason to congratulate herself that the fire was confined to the outskirts of the business district and did not start at the end of Main street or in the center of the principal business uistrict.
