SPAIN'S YOUNG KING.

The Baby Ruler and His Cat, and the Beg-Stories of the little King of Spain are in order now that his recovery has been assured, and several new ones have come out. The young King, as is well known, has been brought up in a strictly family way, and very much as any other young person of good birth in his kingdom. His mother has very sensibly forbidden the lugging in of the royal features of his life any more frequently than the absolute necessities of the strict rules of the Spanish court etiquette required, and except on the occasion of state cere monials young Alphonso has been attended almost entirely by his mother and by the stalwart peasant nurse who has been his companion from his earliest babyhood to his present comparatively mature age of four years. During his llness she and the Queen were constantly at the little fellow's bedside, and about the only other living creature so constantly in the room was a cat. The young King, before his sickness, had be-2 50 gun to tire of his baby playthings that had been at his command, and, seeking other toys, let his fancy light upon a Maltese cat that he saw somewhere about the palace. The animal at once became a creature of distinguished consideration in the royal household. It answered to the name of Perico. The ribbon upon its neck was tied there by the King himself, and when he was taken sick the King insisted that pussy should be in the room with him. So, for a full month the faithful cat was constantly in the sick chamber. Naturally the animal became a great favorite, and one of the high ladies at the court made for it an embroidered cushion upon which it slept. Another story from the sick room, and one that has more of the flavor usually found in stories of royal infants, George Washington and other lofty personages, ieals with a little crippled girl whom the King met on one of his walks or rides shout with his nurse before he was taken sick and to whom, seeing often again, be had taken a fancy. It came to be that whenever the King in his outings saw the little cripple he would make one of the ladies of honor descend from the carriage and carry some little gift to o her. When he had been sick for a while he said to his mother one day:

"What will become of my little cripple and what will she eat now that I go out no more? "Bread," said the Queen, "like all the poor people; that is, if she can get it." "I am too little to command," said the "As it is to do good," replied the Queen, "I will permit you to give or-
