The house has only three rooms, and looks as if a high wind would utterly demolish it; the land is so poor that it was slow starvation to cultivate it. But it was all the home Margaret had. You may judge that she was very glad to receive the liberal price father paid for me, and my own mother could not have given me more loving care. Every year father came to take me away, and every year was persuaded to leave me, until I was eight years old, and a marvel of rugged health and perfect ignorance. Then I was put in boarding-school, but I still spent my summer vacations with old one in the world who claimed kindred with her, no one else but me to love, Margaret loved me with her whole The place is so utterly valueless that we laden with good tidings, and all three his Ambassador. can neither sell it nor rent it, and it were talking eagerly and earnestly. represents only the love of an old woman for her nursling."

After this explanation, Wharton bore Daisy. the jesting about Daisy's real estate with perfect good nature, and declared his intention of erecting a palatial country seat upon the place, when he became a millionaire and Judge of the Supreme Court.

Being people of modest desires, and having an income of about six hundred dollars apiece, Wharton and Daisy saw this a colony of miners. no reason to delay their wedding, and were married with a large assemblage of true friends around them. They went to housekeeping in a little house, modestly furnished, and were fair specimens of "love in a cottage." But Wharton Hill was ambitious.

Having studied his profession under great difficulties often going hungry to buy needful books, often losing his night's rest to pore over knotty points, he was both fond and proud of his life work, and strove to win a good position therein. His love for Daisy, true, honest love, was never allowed to interfere with his pursuit of fame in his profession, and after he was married he attacked his studies with fresh ardor, spending his time in his office, when not actually engaged in the court-room.
