Their faces were painted in the most glaring colors, their bright and many colored blankets fluttered in the wind, secured to the saddle only by an end or a corner, their long black hair streaming back like the pennant at the mast head of a ship, and their deep, black eyes gleamed like diamonds in a dungeon. Arrow after arrow flew from deep strung bows and sunk to the feathered end in the quivering flesh of the shaggy monsters. Ponderous spears were hurled with the power and precision of giants and struck down the defenseless victims as a sturdy woodman strikes down the frail sapling in his path.

"Crack!" "crack!" came from rifles, and "ping!" "ping!" from carbines and revolvers. Hundreds of shots were fired by those who carried firearms, and before these murderous weapons the poor bison sank like ripened grain before the reaper's blade.

One young warrior, more ardent and fearless than the rest, had forced his high strung steed far into the middle of the solid phalanx, where the horse was finally impaled upon the horns of a monster.
