The late Professor Morren related once in our hearing a rebuke which he gave to a high strung Beacon Hill damsel, which is worth repeating for the moral it carries. The young lady was one of his pupils and made herself particularly obnoxious by her haughty and even insolent bearing, displaying her contempt for all about her so markedly that it became at last unbearable. "I knew her mother in France," said the professor, whose broken English there is no need of producing here, "and she was a most exquisitely modest and unassuming woman. But the daughter was so insolent that she had to have a lesson, so I said to her:
