A Fallacy.
One of the fallacies of the present hour is the belief that "for comfort," or "for ease," will keep clothing free from moths. The first part of the deception is that it contains neither camphor nor tar. Its proper name is naphthalin. According to specialists, Dr. Kolinski, "naphthalin may affect the eyes in an extraordinary manner, through its property of deleteriously affecting the nutritive property of blood. The eye being a vascular organ, the structure readily undergoes degeneration. The effects of it are ecchymosis, white patches in the retina, cloudiness in the lens and cataracts in the vitreous humor."
Because of its cheapness, housewives use it so plentifully that one is suffocated by its sickening odor on entering many dwellings and stores. While it produces cataracts, only those who are afflicted with the disease can endure it without suffering from smarting of the eyes and throat when in contact with the pungency of its odor. Only care and absolute cleanliness can protect from moths. A few whole cloves put in with the clothing and inclosed in newspapers is a better preventive than naphthalin.—Homemaker.

Music in the Thunder.
A startling and most remarkable phenomenon occurred in Brookfield, Fairfield county, on Sunday night, Aug. 30, which will be remembered to life's end by those who heard it. About the time for the evening service, and when the congregations of the churches were awaiting the beginning of worship, it began to thunder and lightning in the distance, and the shower appeared to be rapidly approaching until it was directly overhead.
Suddenly there was a burst of musical thunder, sounding somewhat like a gong in different tones, and so marked were the musical notes as to be sweet and almost lugubrious. As quick as a flash, the eyes of the congregation in the church were directed to the ceiling, and the suppressed cry of "What's that?" could be heard all over the church. "It's thunder!" was the exclamation from all. All were startled, although some were more frightened than others.—Danbury (Conn.) N. Y.

THE CLEW.
This life is but a labyrinth.
A slender clue it hides.
O'er its maze, self the minotaur
That far within resides.
And softly each dim passage way
With silent feet we tread,
Advancing steadily but slow,
Lest we should snap the thread.
For lost the slender clue of love,
The way could not be trod
Which leads from narrowness and dark
Out to the scope of God.

BOUND FOR GREEN FIELDS
It was a lovely May morning, a morning which even the life of an omnibus driver seemed endurable. Besides, the particular company for which Archy Johnson worked had become infected by socialist principles, to the extent of only employing the hands from 7 a. m. to 10 p. m., and giving them, as a rule, the alternate Sundays. So that, as things went, he might be considered well off.
Better off, at all events, than the pale young man who, as Archy completed his arrangements before starting, watched him, with a rather melancholy air, from the curbstone. For this pale young man, whose name was Warner, by special permission of the company, to whom a benevolent clergyman had appealed on Warner's behalf, came every morning at 7 o'clock to see if there was a conductor off work, and if there was to take his place on the omnibus. For the last month he had presented himself regularly, and the men had come to know and even kindly looked toward him; but in that month he had only been on seven days. So that fate inevitably raised the question as to what Warner did with himself when no vacancies occurred. He did not look as if he did anything very remunerative. Nothing more remunerative, probably Archy guessed correctly, as he glanced across, than tramping the streets in search of permanent employment.

Archy's omnibus started last, and he had two or three minutes to spare; so, being a good fellow, he turned over to the pale young man, who, for his part, responded with an anxious good will in which, if Archy had known, there was a certain undercurrent of penitence. The fact was Warner had been thinking as he saw the omnibuses roll away and realized with a sigh that all the men were on duty. "What if one of them were to die and he were taken on a street car?" he thought. The thought of this thought to his kindly and gentle nature seemed terrible, and the consciousness of guilt made him tone to Archy one of depressed gloom. He did not in any way appear for pity, and yet the few facts Archy drew from him were an appeal to any conversant with the city. He lived a mile away, 24 Dik street, an upper tenement, and he was a carpenter and comfortably off, but now he was hopelessly out of work, and with his long hair and young child had been living how he could.

"We feel it most, you see," he said in his patient way, "for the child." Then he looked at himself, as if he had said too much, and added quite softly, "But it's a long time that has no turning, isn't it?"
"Yes," said Archy, reserving to himself a reflection that life contained some very long times, indeed, as not of a cheering character.
No more passed between them just then, for the conductor's time was up. But the pale young man, as his eyes encountered the depressed looking figure again, a sudden impulse seized him.

"Can you take my place today?" he said, addressing Warner. "I'm awfully anxious to have the day, but I can't risk getting sacked."
Warner's face beamed.
"I told Janet this morning," he said, as he followed Archy, "I'd a feeling I should be in luck today."
"It's just here," said Archy, staring straight before him. "I'm thinking of two or three days for a day or two, or maybe on the spot, how long I may require to stay. And it would be a load off my mind to know my place wouldn't be snatched up."

"I'll keep it for you," said Warner eagerly. "And give it to you when you come back, for it's a queer thing, as I know, to be thinking of a day or two, and I'm sure I hope you'll have a pleasant journey. Beautiful down in the country this time of year, isn't it?"
"Ah!" said Archy. "Yes, the country's a fine place, especially, as you say, about this time of the year, when you can lie down in a field and smoke a pipe without catching cold, otherwise than from the general treacherousness of the weather. Objects, as meadows, spring flowers, cowbells, rippling streams, a blue sky when it doesn't happen to be rainy, fresh air, and the whole of wholesome victuals, that's my style."

Archy had spoken jerkily and rapidly, but with entire composure; and yet there was something in his tone, a suggestion of a possible want of sincerity, that made Warner's brain whirl.

"I expect that would be all our styles," he said timidly. "If we could afford it. You've friends in the country, I suppose."
"Ah!" replied Archy, benignly looking at Warner for the first time. "Lots of 'em. Fellows who would share their last crust with me. But it ain't come to that; they live on the other side of the land, I tell you."
"You're a lucky fellow," said Warner admiringly.

"Well," said Archy, with still deeper gravity, "sometimes I think I am in a bad way, now you mention it. Especially this morning. And now I think as there's a particular train I have in my mind to catch, and as your time's just up, I'll bid you good day."

He grasped Warner's hand and turned away. After all, he had said and done nothing remarkable, and yet, such was the serene benignity of his manner, that for a moment Warner stood stock still on the pavement, staring after him.

Archy went back to his lodgings, but he could not rest, and soon he went out. He found himself wondering what Warner's wife and child were like, and it struck him that, as he had nothing else to do, he would go around by Dik street.
It was a small street of tiny, jerry built houses, with their numbers inscribed very legibly on the doors, so that Archy had no difficulty in recognizing 24. There was a heavy door at the end of the street, and as he passed he glanced furtively in, as if it were a crime. It was a small, bare room with no furniture but a deal table, a box or two and a chair. A woman sat on the hearth, whose fire had gone out. On that rocking chair a girl was sitting, with a baby in her arms, rocking slowly to and fro, and singing weakly, over and over again.

There is not in the wide world a valley so sweet.
A mere girl she looked, but very wasted and her cheeks were of a sickly color, and yet it was one of the sweetest faces Archy thought that he had ever seen. It was Warner's wife, perhaps he was a lucky fellow after all.

He wondered if there was anything to eat in the house. She did not look as if there was. But for the life of him he dared neither ask her nor order anything. He went to the nearest provision dealer's, and though he got a shilling inside the door that should look as if it belonged to one of them, and had been mislaid, none of them were feasible. If it had been possible, he thought, scanning the water supply with a critical eye, he might have clambered on the roof and dropped the shilling down the chimney. He was nearly as tall as the house already, and he could climb like a sailor. But it was broad daylight, and at last he had been founding all this time in front of a small grocer's shop close by—he turned away in despair, reflecting that, after all, Warner had had a day's work on Monday, and it was only Wednesday. He would go now into some quarter of the city and look for work himself. For work? Well, yes. It was hardly that he consciously made up his mind to do so. But that was what he did.

It was a month later, and Archy had not gone back to his old position. Neither, however, had he found regular work. If he had gone to the right quarters, it may be said, of course, he might have found it. He might have been assisted to emigrate, and a dozen things. But, unluckily, the poor are seldom consulted with the many admirable schemes set on foot for their relief, and Archy had a general idea that philanthropic institutions only drove an omnibus from one official to another, without really doing anything for him. It was a mistake, of course, but one of the natural results of the division of labor. Archy stood, indeed, for a moment outside the doors of the general relief office, and he saw the beautiful probability of his story of having been dismissed from work, and yet he did not go in, owing to a feeling that a white face and girl, through a window, singing the "Meeting of the Waters"—as related to a credulous relief committee—struck him so forcibly that he broke into a loud laugh as he turned away.

But it was not a cheerful laugh. Though he had given up his old lodging and been sleeping where he could, the few pence he had earned in the street, and the few cents he had won for weeks he had not had a hearty meal. A dull despair was creeping over him; but he tramped on, and he was not at all discouraged by the fact that the officials at different relief offices were looking on him with suspicion, as one whom they had refused before. And all the time he knew that he might go back to his old place. Warner would give it up without a murmur or a grudge; he was that kind of fellow. Then he fancied Warner going home to tell his wife the news, and then he thought of the child, and he was setting on. He fancied he would go and see that day when Warner's omnibus stopped at the end of the route, at 1 o'clock, every passenger had left it. They had a quarter of an hour to wait, and the driver slipped hastily across to his favorite public house, which was conveniently situated. Warner looked eagerly up and down the street, and he was not a little surprised when a policeman a little way down; there was a shabby looking fellow standing at the end of the street, and he was looking at him with a suspicious eye. Warner held out his hand, and she sprang in.

"Here it is," she said, proudly, unpacking her small basket. "You can't guess what I've managed to get for you today, and if you eat it now I do believe it will be hot."
"Meat pie, Janet," said Archy. "Well, you are a cook and no mistake. I've twice before this, and I'm sure it's the best I ever ate. You must have done it up for me before we're time to start."
"She's a long way off," said Janet, with a look of disappointment. "You must have your pie, Will; she won't be here yet awhile."

But the old lady, having made various excuses for her delay, and having given her speed, which suggested to a casual observer the inadvisability, in a general way, of attempting to persuade a woman that a man or train, which she literally sees before her, is not really there, she turned and is not going to start till the time appointed. Statistics are very well—she sees the time table. Nothing has altered, it never started before, and it's the same now. No, no; but the safest side is inside.

"Very well, then," said Warner reluctantly. "Hang the old girl—look at her unreluctantly. Take one of these Pellets. They regulate the system perfectly. Take one for a gentle laxative or corrective; three for a cathartic."

If you suffer from Constipation, Indigestion, Bilious Attacks, Sick or Bilious Headaches, or any derangement of the liver, stomach, or bowels, try these little Pellets. They bring a permanent cure. Instead of shocking and weakening the system with violence, like the ordinary pills, they act in a perfectly easy and natural way. They're the simplest, the easiest to take—and the cheapest. They're guaranteed to give satisfaction, or your money is returned. You pay only for the good you get.

PATIENCE.
Be patient! Easy words to speak
While plenty fills the cup of life.
While health brings roses to the cheek,
And far removed are care and strife.
Falling so glibly from the tongue
Of those—often think of this—
Whom suffering has never wrong,
Who scarcely know what patience is.
Be patient when the sufferer lies
Prostrate beneath some ill disease,
And longs, through torturing agonies,
Only for one short hour of ease.
Be patient when the weary brain
Is racked with thought and anxious care,
And twines in an endless train
Seem almost more than it can bear.
To feel the torture of delay,
The agony of hope deferred,
To labor still from day to day,
The prize in view, the prayer unheard,
And still to hope and strive and wait
The due reward of fortune's kiss.
This is to learn what patience is.
This is to know what patience is.
Be patient, though the clouds are dark,
And storm and danger veil the sky.
Let fate and chance guide thy bark.
The storm will pass; the tide is high.
Be patient, and the tide will turn,
Shadows will flee before the sun.
These are the hopes that live and burn
To light us till our work is done.

A Great Lacquer Artist.
Artistic Japan has suffered another great loss in the death of Mr. Shibata Junzo, commonly known as Zeshin, who expired on the 13th of July, at the ripe age of eighty-five. A greater worker in lacquer probably never lived than this remarkable artist. Everything that he touched was a masterpiece of the most beautiful and refined character, and repeatedly during the last ten years he gave practical demonstrations of the fact that the capacity of modern Japanese artisans to produce lacquer of the highest quality is in no respect inferior to the capacity of the great masters of former times.
Zeshin was among the ten artists chosen last year to receive the special protection of the imperial household, and he had obtained more than a dozen gold, silver and copper medals for work shown by him at various exhibitions. He was a finished expert in every process of lacquer manufacture, and his decorative skill, exercised chiefly after the fashion of the Shijo school, perpetually furnished novel and exquisite examples.

EXPENSIVE ECONOMY.
Some people begrudge the little money that an American's Plaster costs, and then when they are racked with pain from a lame back, or from the soreness arising from a cold, they will spend any amount of money to relieve the pain. If they only had one of these world-renowned plasterers, they would be saved a vast amount of suffering and be considerably richer. At the first sign of stiffness of the back, apply one of these plasters without any delay. The soreness will be greatly relieved at once and soon disappear entirely. It will be money saved to have them on hand, to say nothing of the comfort they bring.

HOW WE GROW OLD.
The thread that binds us to life is most frequently severed ere the meridian of life is reached in the case of persons who neglect obvious means to renew failing strength. Vigor, no less the source of happiness than the condition of long life, can be created and perpetuated where it does not exist. Thousands who have experienced the enfeeblement of old age, the feeble constitutions and debilitated and shattered systems, have found a steady performance of the bodily functions, renewed appetite, flesh and strength, and a happy old age, by the use of Dr. Hatter's Stomach Bitters.
