The Doctor's Dilemma

By Hesba Stretton

"You are looking rather low," she said triumphantly. "I am, I might say. Is there anything the matter with you? Your face is as long as a fiddle. Perhaps it is the sea that makes you melancholy."

"Not at all," I answered, trying to speak briskly. "I am an old sailor. Perhaps you will feel melancholy by-and-by."

Luckily for me, my prophecy was fulfilled shortly after, for the day was rough enough to produce uncomfortable sensations in those who were not old sailors like myself. My tempter was prostrate to the last moment.

When we anchored at the entrance of the Creux, and the small boats came out to carry us ashore, I managed easily to secure a place in the first, and to lose sight of her in the bustle of landing. As soon as my feet touched the shore I started off at my swiftest pace for the Havre Gosselin.

But I had not far to go, for at Vaudin's Inn, which stands at the top of the steep lane running from the Creux Harbor, I saw Tardif at the door. He came to me instantly, and we sat down on a low stone wall on the roadside, but well out of hearing of any ears but each other's.

"Tardif," I said, "has mam'zelle told you her secret?"

"Yes, yes," he answered, "poor little soul! she is a hundredfold dearer to me now than before. But mam'zelle is not here. She is gone!"

"Gone!" I ejaculated. I could not utter another word; but I stared at him as if my eyes could tear further information from him.

"Yes," he said, "that lady came last week with Miss Dobree, your cousin. Then mam'zelle told me all, and we took counsel together. It was not safe for her to stay any longer, though I would have died for her gladly. But what could be done? We knew she must go elsewhere, and the next morning I rowed her over to Peter-port in time for the steamer to England. Poor little thing! poor little humbug!"

"Tardif," I said, "did she leave no message for me?"

"She wrote a letter for you," he said, "the very last thing. She did not go to bed that night, neither did I. I was going to lose her, doctor, and she had been like the light of the sun to me. But what could I do? She was terrified to death at the thought of her husband claiming her. I promised to give the letter into your own hands. Here it is!"

It had been lying in his breast pocket, and the edges were worn already. He gave it to me lingeringly, as if loth to part with it. The tourists were coming up in greater numbers, and I made a retreat hastily towards a quiet and a note part of the cliffs seldom visited in Little Sark.

There, with the sea, which had carried her away from me, playing buoyantly amongst the rocks, I read her farewell letter. It ran thus:

"My Dear Friend—I am glad I can call you my friend, though nothing can ever come of our friendship—nothing, for we may not see one another as other friends do. I am compelled to flee away again from this quiet, peaceful home, where you and Tardif have been so kind to me. I began to feel perfectly safe here, and all at once the refuge fails me. It breaks my heart, but I must go, and my only gladness is that it will be good for you. By and by you will forget me, and return to your cousin Julia. I am happy just as you once thought you should be—as you would have been but for me. You must think of me as one dead. I am quite dead—lost to you."

"Good-by, my dear friend," she wrote, "good-by!"

The last line was written in a shaken, irregular hand, and her name was half-blotted out, as if a tear had fallen upon it. I remained there alone on the wild and solitary cliffs until it was time to return to the steamer.

Tardif was waiting for me at the entrance of the little tunnel through which the road passes down to the harbor. He did not speak at first, but he drew out of his pocket an old leather pouch filled with yellow papers. Amongst them lay a long curling tress of shining hair. He touched it gently as if it had feeling and consciousness.

"You would like to have it, doctor?" he said.

"Ay," I answered, and that only. I could not venture upon another word.

CHAPTER XVII.

Three months passed slowly away after my mother's death. Dr. Dobree, who was utterly incomprehensible the first few weeks, fell into his old manner, phlegmatically ways again, spending hours upon his toilet, and paying devoted attentions to every passable woman who came across his path. My temper grew like touchwood, the least spark would set a blaze. I could not take such things in good part.

We had been at daggers drawn for a day or two, and I, when one morning I was astonished by the appearance of Julia in our consulting room, soon after my father, having dressed himself elaborately, had quitted the house. Julia's face was ominous, the upper lip very straight, and a frown upon her brow.

"Martin," she began in a low key, "I am come to tell you something that fills me with shame and anger. I do not know how to contain myself. I could never have believed that I could have been so blind and foolish. But it seems as if I were doomed to be deceived and disappointed on every hand—I who would not deceive or disappoint anybody in the world. I declare it makes me quite ill to think of it. Just look at my hands, how they tremble."

"Your nervous system is out of order," I remarked.

"It is the world that is out of order," she said petulantly. "I am well enough. Oh, I do not know how I am to tell you. There are some things it is a shame to speak of."

"Must you speak of them?" I asked.

"Yes; you must know, you will have to know all sooner or later. If my poor, dear aunt knew of it she could not rest in her grave. Martin, cannot you guess? Arise, born so dull that they cannot see what is going on under their own eyes?"

"I have not the least idea of what you are driving at," I answered. "Sit down and calm yourself."

"How long is it since my poor, dear aunt died?"

"You know as well as I do," I replied, wondering that she should touch the wound so roughly. "Three months next Sunday."

"And Dr. Dobree," she said in a bitter accent—then stopped, looking me full in the face. I had never heard her call my father Dr. Dobree in my life.

"What now?" I asked. "What has my unlucky father been doing now?"

"Why," she exclaimed, stamping her foot, while the blood mantled to her forehead, "Dr. Dobree is in haste to take a second wife! He is indeed, my poor Martin. He wishes to be married immediately to that viper, Kate Daltrey."

"Impossible!" I cried, stung to the quick by these words. I remembered my mother's mild, instinctive dislike to Kate Daltrey, and her harmless hope that I would not go over to her side. Go over to her side! No. If she set her foot into this house as my mother's successor, I would never dwell under the same roof. As soon as my father made her his wife I would cut myself adrift from them both. But he knew that; he would never venture to outrage my mother's memory or my feelings in such a flagrant manner.

"It is possible, for it is true," said Julia. "They have understood each other for these four weeks. You may call it an engagement, for it is one; and I never suspected them, not for a moment! I didn't you take out a commission of lunacy against him? He must be made to think of such a thing."

"How did you find it out?" I inquired.

"Oh, I was so ashamed!" she said. "You see I had not the faintest shadow of a suspicion. I had left them in the drawing room to go upstairs, and I thought of something I wanted, and went back suddenly, and there they were—his arm around her waist, and her head on his shoulder—he with his gray hairs, too! She says she is the same age as me, but she is forty if she is a day. The simpletons! I did not know what to say, or how to look. I could not get out of the room again as if I had not seen, for I cried, 'Oh! at the first sight of them. They stood staring at them; but I think they felt as uncomfortable as I did.'"

"Julia," I said, "I shall leave Guernsey before this marriage can come off. I would rather break stones on the highway than stay to see that woman in my mother's place. My mother disliked her more part of the cliffs seldom visited in Little Sark."

"I know it," she replied, with tears in her eyes, "and I thought it was nothing but prejudice. It was my fault, bringing her to Guernsey. But I could not bear the idea of her coming as mistress here. I said so distinctly. 'Dr. Dobree,' I said, 'you must let me remind you that this house is mine, though you have paid me no rent for years. If you ever take Kate Daltrey into it, I will put my affairs into a notary's hands. I will, upon my word, and Julia Dobree never broke her word yet.' That brought him to his senses better than anything. He turned very pale, and sat down beside Kate, hardly knowing what to say. Then she began. She said if I was cruel, she would be cruel, too. Whatever grieved you, Martin, would grieve me, and she would let her brother, Richard Foster, know where Olivia was."

"Does she know where she is?" I asked eagerly, in a tumult of surprise and hope.

"Why, in Sark, of course," she replied. "She left Sark before my mother's death?" I said, with a chill of disappointment. "Did I never tell you she was gone, nobody knows where?"

"You have never spoken of her in my hearing, except once—you recollect when, Martin? We have supposed she was still living in Tardif's house. Then there is nothing to prevent me from carrying out my threat. Kate Daltrey shall never enter this house as mistress."

"Julia," I said, "I am giving it up for Olivia's sake?" I asked, marveling at her generosity.

"I should have done it for your sake," she answered frankly.

"But," I said, reverting to our original topic, "if my father has set his mind upon marrying Kate Daltrey, he will have to do it."

"He is a dotard," replied Julia. "He positively makes me dread growing old. Who knows what follies one may be guilty of in old age? I never felt afraid of it before. Kate says she has two hundred a year of her own, and they will go and live on that in Jersey, if Guernsey becomes unpleasant to them. Martin, she is a viper—she is indeed. And I have made such a friend of her! Now I shall have no one but you and the Careys. Why wasn't I satisfied with Johanna as my friend?"

She stayed an hour longer, turning over this unwelcome subject till we had thoroughly discussed every point of it. In the evening, after dinner, I spoke to my father briefly but decisively upon the same topic. After a very short and very sharp conversation, there remained no alternative for me but to make up my mind to try my fortune once more out of Guernsey. I wrote by the next mail to Jack Senior, telling him my purpose.

I did not wait for my father to commit the irreparable folly of his second marriage. Guernsey had become hateful to me. In spite of my exceeding love for my native island, more beautiful in the eyes of its people than any other spot on earth, I could no longer be happy or at peace there. Julia could not conceal her regret, but I left her in the charge of Captain Carey and Johanna. She promised to be my faithful correspondent, and I engaged to write to her regularly. There existed between us the half-betrothal to which we had pledged ourselves at my dying mother's urgent request. She would wait for the time when Olivia was no longer the first in my heart; then she would be willing to become my wife. But if ever that day came she would require me to give up my position in England, and settle down for life in Guernsey.

Fairly, then, I was launched upon the career of a physician in the great city, as a partner with Jack and his father. The completeness of the change suited me. Nothing here, in scenery, atmosphere or society, could remind me of the fretted past. The troubled waters subsided into a dull calm, as far as emotional life went. To be sure, the idea crossed me often that Olivia might be in London—even in the same street with me—I never caught sight of a faded green dress but my steps were hurried, and I followed till I was sure that the wearer was not Olivia. But I was aware that the chances of our meeting were so small that I could not count upon them. Even if I found her, what then? She was as far away from me as though the Atlantic rolled between us. If I only knew that she was safe, and as happy as her sad destiny could let her be, I would be content.

Thus I was thrown entirely upon my profession for interest and occupation. I gave myself up to it with an energy that amazed Jack, and sometimes surprised myself. Dr. Senior, who as an old veteran loved it with ardor for its own sake, was delighted with my enthusiasm. He prophesied great things for me.

So passed my first winter in London.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Early in the spring I received a letter from Julia, desiring me to look out for apartments, somewhere in my neighborhood, for herself and Johanna and Captain Carey. They were coming to London to spend two or three months of the season. I had not had any task so agreeable since I left Guernsey. Jack was hospitably anxious for them to come to our own house, but I knew they would not listen to such a proposal. I found some suitable rooms for them, however, where I could be with them at any time in five minutes. On the appointed day I met them at Waterloo station, and installed them in their new apartments.

It struck me that Julia was looking better and happier than I had seen her look for a long time. Her black dress suited her, and gave her a style which she never had in colors. Her complexion looked dark, but not sallow; and her brown hair was certainly more becoming than the faded gray she had worn. I thought of a well-bred, cultivated, almost elegant woman, of whom no man need be ashamed. Johanna was simply herself, without the least perceptible change. But Captain Carey again looked ten years younger, and was evidently taking pains with his appearance. I was more than satisfied, I was proud of all my friends.

"We want you to come and have a long talk with us to-morrow," said Johanna. "It is too late to-night. We shall be busy shopping in the morning, but you come in the evening?"

"Oh, yes," I answered. "I am at leisure most evenings, and I count upon spending them with you. I can escort you to any of the places of amusement as you wish to visit."

"To-morrow, then," she said, "we shall take tea at eight o'clock."

I bade them good-night with a lighter heart than I had felt for a long while. I held Julia's hand the longest, looking into her face earnestly, till it flushed and glowed a little under my scrutiny.

"True heart!" I said to myself, "true and constant! I have nothing, and shall have nothing to offer it but the ashes of a dead love. What do I hope?"

I thought as I paced along Brook street, "I had never been fated to see Olivia!"

I was punctual to my time the next day. I sat among them quiet and silent, but revelling in this partial return of old times. Her eyes were bright, and my tea, and passed it to me with her white hand, I felt inclined to kiss her jeweled fingers. If Captain Carey had not been present I think I should have done so.

We lingered over the pleasant meal. At the close Captain Carey announced that he was about to leave us alone together for an hour or two. I went down to the door with him, for he had made me a mysterious signal to follow him. In the hall he whispered a few incoherent sentences into my ear, and then he said, "Don't think anything of me, my boy. Don't sacrifice yourself for me. I'm an old fellow compared to you, though I'm not fifty yet; everybody in Guernsey knows that. So put me out of the question, Martin. We have said a wip' twist the cup." "We have said the wip' twist," I said, "I know quite well, my dear fellow."

He was gone before I could ask for an explanation. I returned to the drawing room, pondering over his words. Johanna and Julia sat side by side, looking on the sofa, in the darkest corner of the room.

"Come here, Martin," said Johanna; "we wish to consult you on a subject of great importance to us all."

I drew up a chair opposite to them and sat down, much as I was about to be a medical consultation.

"It is nearly eight months since your poor dear mother died," remarked Johanna.

"Eight months! Yes; and no one knew what those eight months had been to me—how desolate! how empty!"

"You recollect," continued Johanna, "how her heart was set on your marriage with Julia, and the promise you both made to her on her deathbed?"

"Yes," I answered, bending forward and pressing Julia's hand, "I remember every word."

There was a minute's silence after this; and I waited in some wonder as to what this prelude was leading to.

"Martin," asked Johanna, in a solemn tone, "are you forgetting Olivia?"

"No," I said, dropping Julia's hand as the image of Olivia flashed across me reproachfully, "not at all. What would you have me say? She is as dear to me at this moment as she ever was."

"I thought you would say so," she replied; "I did not think you were a love that would quickly pass away, if it ever does. There are men who can love with the constancy of a woman. Do you know anything of her?"

"Nothing," I said despondently; "I have no clue as to where she may be now."

"Nor has Tardif," she continued; "my brother and I went across to Sark last week to ask him."

"That was very good of you," I interrupted.

"It was partly for our own sakes," she said, blushing faintly. "Martin, Tardif says that if you have once loved Olivia, it is once for all. You would never conquer it. Do you think that this is true? Be candid with us."

"Yes," I answered, "it is true. I could never love again as I love Olivia."

"Then, my dear Martin," said Johanna, very softly, "do you wish to keep Julia to her promise?"

I started violently. What! did Julia wish to be released from that semi-engagement, and be free? Was it possible that any one else coveted my place in her affections, and in the new house which we had fitted up for ourselves? I felt like the dog in the manger. It seemed an unheard-of encroachment for any person to come between my cousin Julia and me.

"Do you ask me to set you free from your promise, Julia?" I asked, somewhat sternly.

(To be continued.)

CAT NOW IN FAVOR.

Crippled, but She Helped to Find a Fortune.

"I recently filed a claim for the widow of a Mexican war veteran," said H. G. McCormick, of Cincinnati, "that has a rather funny story attached to it that I think will bear repeating, as it was brought about by a one-eyed, hobbled cat of no pedigree and of absolutely no worth, that is now getting as a priceless treasure by Mrs. Maggie Tuttle, an aged widow, residing at Harrison, about ten miles from Cincinnati. A small boy with a sling destroyed one of the cat's eyes, and a few days afterward, in an attempt to knock a train from the track, the cat lost half its tail; but the cat came back, and thereby hangs the tale, not the cat's tail, by the way."

"When I filed the papers for the pension of Mrs. Tuttle, whose husband was a sergeant in the Twelfth United States Infantry, it was found that all was in good shape, except his discharge papers, and I at once requested that a search be made for these documents. She was certain that her husband had left them somewhere in the old homestead, and a diligent search was at once instituted. The old house was ransacked from cellar to garret with no result, and when the effort was about to be given up in despair it was noticed that the old cat took a great deal of interest in the old garret. It went to a box in one corner of the room and jumped into it. Upon looking into the box it was found that four kittens were nestled in some old paper. When an effort was made to look into the box the old cat grew ferocious and attacked the searchers. One of the party, who did not like the cat anyway, picked up a book and threw it at it. This book missed the cat, but struck an old paste-board box on a shelf and knocked it to the floor, where it burst open and the contents rolled out on the floor. Upon picking them up the discharge papers and $3,000 in government bonds were found. The old cat now wears a blue ribbon and has the run of the house—in fact, nothing is too good for it!"—Washington Star.

How to Become Wealthy.

In a New Hampshire city there dwells an octogenarian physician who, in addition to his wide medical skill, is known far and wide as a dispenser of blunt philosophy. The other day a young man of his acquaintance called at his office.

"I have not come for pills this time, doctor," said the visitor, "but for advice. You have lived many years in this world of toil and trouble and have had much experience. I am young and I want you to tell me how to get rich."

The aged practitioner gazed through his glasses at the young man and in a deliberate tone, said:

"Yes, I can tell you. You are young and you can accomplish your object if you will. Your plan is this: First, be industrious and economical. Save as much as possible and spend as little. Pile up the dollars and put them at interest. If you follow out these instructions by the time you reach my age you'll be as rich as Croesus and as mean as I am!"—Buffalo Commercial.

Literary Landmarks Doomed.

The doom of another batch of literary landmarks has lately been sealed. First the old Black Bull Tavern in Holborn, where Mrs. Gamp nursed Mr. Lewsons in partnership with Betty Prig—Nursed together, turn and turn about, one off, one on. Then the Red Lion, at Henley-on-Thames, in which Shenstone was said to have written familiar lines which Dr. Johnson quoted to maintain his thesis that "there is nothing which has yet been contrived by man by which so much happiness is produced as by a good tavern or inn." Later, too, Burford-bridge Hotel, near Box-hill, where Keats finished "Endymion" toward the end of 1817, has been in the market—whether for demolition or not, we cannot say.—Literature.

Sailor Poets Wanted.

An English literary writer says that "the time is fully ripe for the advent of a sailor poet and the marine engineer poet. Whether they write in terms of rhyme or no I care not. A virgin field awaits them, a noble inheritance, maturing for ages. They can, if they come, utterly refute the false and foolish prattle of the armchair philosophers and prove triumphantly that so far from the romance and poetry of the sea being dead it has hardly yet been given any adequate expression whatever."

To Help the Thing Along.

"Yes, grandfather is 99 years and 6 months of age."

"You ought to get him a bicycle."

"What for?"

"So as to help him make a century."

COLONEL R. C. JUDSON.

Devotes Himself to Developing Agricultural Resources of Washington, Oregon and Idaho.

The latest good work started by Colonel R. C. Judson, of Portland, is the holding of exchange fairs at central business points at frequent intervals. Farmers and stockmen attend these fairs and display their farm products, also cattle, horses and sheep, in the streets for a day or two. Sales are then made to local merchants. They in turn are patronized freely. Business moves briskly. Ideas are exchanged. The women folks enjoy shopping and a brief rest. Land sales are also made. Settlers are attracted by the newspaper publicity. Colonel Judson's efforts are always original, attractive and substantial. He believes in amity rather than animosity, a principle that makes friends and business for his railroad, the O. R. & N. The practical experiments conducted by Mr. Judson on the O. R. & N. Walla Walla farm, his broad views in encouraging diversified farming, and work of organizing farmer's institute meetings, have made him a familiar figure to all the progressive industrial workers of the United States. The United States agricultural department has been attracted by his work and used his methods as object lessons in encouraging the same kind of work in other states.

PRESIDENT'S PROCLAMATION.

Sets Apart Thursday, November 28, as a Day of National Thanksgiving.

Washington, Nov. 2.—President Roosevelt today issued his proclamation fixing Thursday, November 28, as a day of national thanksgiving. It reads:

"A Proclamation. The season is nigh when, according to the time-hallowed custom of our people, the president appoints a day as the especial occasion for praise and thanksgiving to God."

"This Thanksgiving finds the people still bowed with sorrow for the death of a great and good president. We mourn for President McKinley because we loved and honored him, and the manner of his death should awaken in the breasts of our people a keen anxiety and a resolute purpose not to be driven by any calamity from the path of strong, orderly, popular liberty, which, as a nation, we have thus far safely trod."

"Yet, in spite of this great disaster, it is nevertheless true that no people on earth have such abundant cause for thanksgiving as we have. The past year, in particular, has been one of peace and plenty. We have prospered in things material, and have been able to work for our own uplifting in things intellectual and spiritual. Let us remember that, as much as has been given us, much will be expected from us; and that true homage comes from the heart as well as from the lips and shows itself in deeds. We can best prove our thankfulness to the Almighty by the way in which, on this earth, and at this time, each of us does his duty to his fellow men."

"Now, therefore, I, Theodore Roosevelt, president of the United States, do hereby designate as a day of general thanksgiving, Thursday, the 28th of this present November, and do recommend that throughout the land the people cease from their wonted occupations and at their several homes and places of worship thank the giver of all good for the countless blessings of our national life. In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed."

"Done at the City of Washington, this 23d day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and one, and of the independence of the United States the one hundred and twenty-sixth."

(Seal.)

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

"By the president."

SUBIG BAY NAVAL STATION.

According to the Plans of the Naval Board It Will Cost Over $19,000,000.

Washington, Nov. 5.—The majority report of the naval board, headed by Rear Admiral Taylor, which has prepared plans for the proposed new naval station at Olongapo, P. I., shows that the station will cost this government $19,359,500, exclusive of defensive works, signal station, water supply, coal station, magazines, hospital, encampment grounds and a native village under the control of the naval authorities, which it is proposed to provide for the workmen who will be employed regularly at the Olongapo dockyard. The board recommends that in addition to the four prominent points selected for the defensive works by Admiral Remy's board—Silanguin Island, at the entrance of Port Silanguin; the point on the west side of the entrance to Subig bay; Grande Island, at the mid entrance, and Port Llan, on the east side of Subig bay entrance—another fort be located to protect the landing in Calaguagan bay on the west coast of Zamboanga province, and that the mountain passes leading to the naval reservation on the north and east be fortified. The board's estimate for equipping the station for efficient work of repair and outfit of vessels, pending general development, is $12,903,500. The report concludes with a statement that much of the material for the station must come from the United States, though a good part of it can be obtained at Hong Kong.

Wash. Wash, Nov. 5.—A rear end collision of freight trains occurred in front of the depot here today. The engines were badly smashed, two freight cars and caboose were wrecked, the depot was wrecked and the building fired, and one tramp was slightly hurt. The local freight train was standing on the main track. The engine was detached and was doing some switching. An extra freight train, with cars loaded with wheat, and pulled by two engines, came down the track.

Remains of Admiral Villamil.

New York, Nov. 5.—The Spanish steamship Montserrat, on her way home from Havana, came into port today with her flag at half-mast. In a mortuary apartment aboard the liner is the body of Admiral Villamil, who lost his life during the encounter with the American ships at Santiago. The body is on the way to Spain. Before the Montserrat leaves, the Spanish consul and Spanish residents of this city hold memorial services.

Welsh Miners' Threats.

Cardiff, Wales, Nov. 4.—At a mass meeting of the Merthyr-Tydevel colliers today, the action of their representatives in agreeing to stop work last Friday and Saturday and threatening to stop on other days, in order to keep up the price of coal, and therefore wages, was confirmed and resolutions in support of the future action of the leaders was adopted. The situation is critical, as the employers are strongly inclined to resort to a general lockout.

Lower Cable Rates to the Philippines.

New York, Nov. 4.—The Commercial Cable Company today sent out the following notice: "We are advised that the following reduced rates to the Philippine Islands go into effect on the 15th inst.: Luzon Island, $1.66 per word from New York; all other islands, $1.75 per word from New York."

EVENTS OF THE DAY

FROM THE FOUR QUARTERS OF THE WORLD.

A Comprehensive Review of the Important Happenings of the Past Week Presented in a Condensed Form Which Is Most Likely to Prove of Interest to Our Many Readers.

France has sent an ultimatum to Turkey. Carnegie is not a believer in the Nicaragua canal. Oregon hops took the first prize at the Pan-American. No fresh plague cases have been reported at Liverpool. The Subig bay naval station will cost nearly $20,000,000. All navigation on the Yukon has stopped on account of the ice. An attempt was made to assassinate the dowager empress of China. President Roosevelt has issued his first Thanksgiving proclamation. Efforts are being made to prevent Samar rebels from receiving supplies. The acting governor of Hawaii asks that Oriental laborers be admitted. The report is current in Washington that Chinese Minister Wu has been recalled. Commissioner Hermann reports nearly 35,000,000 acres of unreserved land in Oregon. Botha personally led the attack on the British a few days ago which ended so disastrously for the latter. A captive balloon containing nine persons broke loose at San Francisco and floated away. The occupants landed safely after a ride of 50 miles. The cross examination of Admiral Schley has been concluded. Canada opposes the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. The postal estimates for the coming fiscal year call for $15,000,000. A French squadron sailed for Turkey to press France's demands. Six deaths from plague have occurred at Liverpool since September 2. New York city is flooded with light weight high dollars, which have been "sweated."

A force of British soldiers surprised the Boers, capturing 22 men and two commanders. Two men have been arrested at Roseburg for the Southern Pacific train hold-up. Anarchists throughout the world have held dances and other demonstrations in honor of Czolgosz. Late steamers from Nome say that a reign of terror is expected in Alaska this winter as there are hundreds there who have no means of support. Ten states will vote for state officers this fall. It is believed at Sofia that Miss Stone is dead. Ten persons were killed in the Louisiana race war. A heavy storm has been raging on Puget sound for two days. The Northern Pacific has insured its property for $20,000,000. King Edward's physician attended him at an official reception. The Czolgosz autopsy proved that the murderer was perfectly sane. Noyes has made application for a postpon
