The local option law is not enough like prohibition to arouse very enthusiastic support from the rank and file of the prohibitionists and is at the same time altogether too stringent for the Oregonian and Capital Journal.

The man in the Oregonian tower begs a big question. It is not a matter of prohibition but of local option, which the voters of Oregon decide in June. A matter of whether a community shall have a right to say for itself whether it shall have a saloon and accompanying influences or whether the matter shall be passed up for final decision to the bigoted autocrat in the Oregonian tower.

Many people think a college education is not worth while unless a young person intends to enter one of the professions; that culture and learning are wasted upon those engaged in the common, everyday walks of life. Anent such folly this is good: "If I had a son," said Chancellor James R. Day, of Syracuse University, "and I knew he was destined to drive a mule cart all his days, I would send him to college. I would put as unmeasurable a distance between my son and a mule as possible."

In explaining the charms of the Southern girl, a romantic magazine writer says she gets her pale, creamy complexion from the blooming of the sweet magnolias, her grace of motion from waving palms and her health from eating golden oranges and flowering figs. Humph! It may not sound quite so poetical, but the Oregon girl mixes her hands with her mother's in the dish water, wields the broom, gets out and exercises in our bracing atmosphere, eats prunes and big red Oregon apples and is as charming as the airy, fairy miss down in Dixie and a whole lot more useful.

Corvallis Times editor on the Keady shooting affair: "The lesson is this. Saloon men will sell intoxicants to minors until an indignant and united people serves notice on them to do it no more. Officers will be moderate in the treatment of offenders until public sentiment, in no uncertain tones, demands a vigorous punishment. Young boys will continue to drink, to haunt the streets at night, and to indulge in further acts of hoodlumism until a determined people warns them to go home at a proper hour, and stay there. The 'gang' will still be the 'gang' and after a while will go on with its mischief, the same as before, unless the people individually and collectively insist that it should be otherwise."

A teacher in Philadelphia who found herself obliged to keep order in a school where four different sorts of pupils were gathered, says that she put an end to fights by forbidding the use of the words "dago," "nigger" and "sheeny." Restrained from calling offensive names, the children got along peaceably enough, although it is probable that birds of a feather flocked together out of school, as they usually do when let alone. It is suggested by an observant journal that the popular epithets applied by children and thoughtless grown people to fellow-beings whom they consider beneath them, cannot possibly do any good, and they undoubtedly do harm. Nobody knows how much bitterness has been engendered by American youngsters shouting "Paddy!" at Irish children, or by the Irish, in their turn, dubbing the Italian "Dago," or by any of the other thoughtless and cruel verbal persecutions common among children. The abandonment of this form of rowdiness will not lead to undesirable racial mixtures, because such things cannot be furthered or prevented thus arbitrarily; and the cultivation of ordinary politeness certainly will tend to peace.

Effectiveness of Local Option.

The sale of alcoholic drinks at retail has probably been the cause of more legislation in the various states of the union than any other. In some of the states it is entirely prohibited by law under severe penalties, but in most of them it is permitted under various restrictions.

That the sale of alcoholic drink is a necessity is proven by the fact that no matter what restrictions are devised nor how stringently laws are made, they invariably are evaded and it has been found impossible to accomplish any good by prohibition.

It seems the best thing then, since the sale cannot be wholly suppressed, that it should be confined to those communities where it is desired, and regulated as far as possible by some rational and well enforced laws.

To many citizens of the United States no final treatment of the subject will be reached until alcoholic drinks are no longer made nor sold nor drunk in the country. But in the face of the facts that there are more than a million people engaged directly in the business of making and selling and more than a thousand million dollars are annually spent for alcoholic drinks, and that hundreds of thousands of foreign born citizens are by instinct and habit totally opposed to their abolition, the consummation of the prohibition ideal certainly seems somewhat remote. Meanwhile there are things which can be done at once.

Local option gives to each and every district the right to declare for or against the admission of the saloon. It seems the only logical way of settling a question under a republican form of government, that the people should abide by the decision of the majority in each community. The people of this country are naturally in favor of good order, and they willingly obey laws which are reasonable and fair. The crusade carried on so long against intemperance in alcoholic drinks was characterized by an intemperance which was detrimental to the good it sought to accomplish. The undoubted earnestness and spirit of self-sacrifice of some of the workers was nullified by the lack of comprehension of the nature and extent of the evil against which they fought.

Experience has taught that the most effective way of regulating this question is through local option in which the majority decides either for or against the sale of liquor within certain prescribed limits. As a result of this experience the local option law idea has been adopted in many quarters with a sufficient degree of success to furnish good arguments for an extension of the principles to other parts of the country.—Portland Journal.

Good Words for the David Brothers.

Returning from a trip of inspection in Yamhill county, State Food and Dairy Commissioner J. W. Bailey has this to say in the Telegram of the David boys' dairy on Chehalem mountain:

"Inspecting the Rameda dairy, at Springbrook," said the inspector, "I found that the proprietors had spared no expense to secure facilities for placing upon the market a product that can be officially guaranteed to the consumer."

"These dairymen have had constructed a milk shed along lines suggested by authorities, of which there can be no question making it possible to turn out a product, milk or cream, pure in every respect. Instead of milking in the barn, the cows are taken into the shed, a structure in cement supplied with hot and cold water and porcelain utensils and accessories required in the business. The milk is at once placed in a cooling room, through which flow streams of water from a spring in the hillside.

Then the cream, after being separated, without leaving the building, is bottled, sealed and placed on the market.

This new venture in dairying promises to revolutionize the industry, for it sets a pace which must be followed in order to keep up with the procession, and there is no reason why every dairyman should not be handling a first-class product only."
