The double column editorial fad hits a newspaper occasionally but it is to the credit of our Oregon exchanges that most of them drop the fad business in a short time and return to the fold.

The fight between Harriman and Hill is a battle of giants for supremacy in railroad building in the Northwest. It is a relief to the people of Oregon to see Hill jabbing Harriman in the slats and to note that the tender spots have at last been reached.

I. A. Manning who has been editor and manager of the Salem Statesman during the past year has severed his connection with the paper and engaged in business in Portland. Ike is a pretty good fellow but he don't shine at his best as editor of a daily paper.

The West Side Enterprise in a two column editorial on "Ex-Governor Geer" gives some inside political history, relative to the causes that led up to the defeat of Geer, both for a second term for governor and for United States senator after he had been endorsed by the people. It makes very interesting reading and will cause certain fellows to sit up and take notice.

In looking over the list of teachers who have recently taken the examination in the different counties the very small per cent of names of male teachers is noticeable. The low wages offered for teachers and the demand for active young men in various avenues of business at better wages has resulted in leaving the field almost entirely to women, except where a principal is demanded at better wages than is paid for teachers in the lower grades.

It is encouraging to the manufacturing interests of Oregon to note that a woolen mill located at Union has recently received an order from Wilesley College, Wilesley, Massachusetts, for a shipment of high grade blankets. Two years ago the same institution bought two hundred pairs of blankets of the same firm and this second order indicates that the first was satisfactory. The progress seems slow sometimes but Oregon is gradually coming to the front as a manufacturing state.

Ex-Governor Geer is to become the editor of the Pendleton Tribune so it is announced. Geer is a fluent writer and we shall be glad to see him in the harness again. When he was writing for the Salem Statesman he made the best editorial page that paper has ever had and the Statesman people evidently care very little for the standing of the paper, else they would not have turned him down. It is said however, that factional politics in which "corn meal Ike" figured prominently was back of it.

Henry E. Reed, of Portland, has been elected director of exploitation for the Alaska-Yukon-Pacific Exposition, which is to be held in Seattle, in 1909 and has entered into a contract for three years service. Seattle people know a good thing when they see it even if it does come from Portland. Mr. Reed achieved great success in his work as manager of the publicity department of the Lewis and Clark fair and his experience will be worth much to Seattle. A better choice could hardly have been made. The Seattle Exposition is to open June 15, 1909, and continue four months.

NAME YOUR FARM HOME.

Some people get the idea that a distinctive name given to a country home is evidence of the fact that the owner is "stuck up," but this is a very narrow, as well as a very uncharitable view to take of it. Any farmer who keeps his buildings painted up, his fences in order and fence rows clear of weeds and undergrowth, and everything about the place in such condition that the home and farm has the appearance of thrift and well directed energy put forth by the owner, is not only entitled to much credit, but he gets a degree of pleasure and satisfaction out of it that fully repays him for all his extra work. The fact that he names his farm "The Oaks," or some other appropriate name, should simply be taken as evidence that he is not ashamed of his surroundings and that he is willing to let the public know where he resides. The custom should become general throughout the country. The American Farmer in speaking of this question says: We are glad to know that the custom of naming farms is becoming quite general. A natural sequence from it is to print the name of the farm on the owner's stationery and thus the farmer and his place become individualized and associated together in the community. There is a business advantage, too, as every letter sent out from "Hickory Grove," "Walnut Lodge," or "Maple Hall," as the case may be, acts as an advertisement of the place. Shakespeare says a poet is able to give even to "airy nothing," a local habitation and a name and surely an attractive farm deserves to enjoy a distinctive personality in the minds of those who visit it or have business with the proprietor.

Wanted—Competent Girl.

The following appeared in the Martinsville, Ind., Democrat and contains a whole lot of truth:

Wanted—Competent girl or middle aged woman for housework who will stay in at night. Permanent position to right party.—Advt in Reporter.

The above advertisement expresses not only an individual but a general want—a want felt in local circles not only, but everywhere and constantly. The girl or woman that stays in at night is a growing and varied want. She is wanted in the household as a maid of work. She is wanted as a companion. She is wanted as a friend, guide, mentor, critic, an aide-de-camp in the home, a lady-superior to the growing girls, and untitled empress in the circles of society, a wife and the mother of men. The girl that stays in at night does something toward fitting herself for the best work in the sphere to which kind nature has assigned her. She holds herself aloof from the allurements that lurk in the mellow moonlight; has no appreciation for the giddy nothings that are voiced under the garnish lights of the late street; guards her womanliness from the temptations and the dangers that lurk in dark corners or under the dense umbra of the wings of night. The woman that stays in at night preserves longest the fresh beauty of nature and cosmetics and paints are as a rule needless. She preserves her mind pure and clean from the moral as well as the physical taints that come, under the darkness and solitude of night. The girl that stays in at night wakes with the lark and finds her limbs rested, her muscles supple, her mind free from taint, and her heart buoyant, like the thistle down floating in the sweet air of the morning, and thus fortified against the daily work and the daily trials that come to all—to her, less than to her sister of the night owl variety, because she starts the day with a safer capital of nerve force and physical ability. The girl that stays in at night is (an heiress in her own right, to health, happiness, purity of complexion and of mind, to a happy and winsome circle of friends, to an appreciative husband, to manly boys and womanly girls, and a pathway of life strewn with the roses of contentment and of joy. The girl that stays in at night is heir to all these, and she is wanted every day in the year. While our best men advertise in the papers, they yet feel the want and each for himself is seeking for a wife amongst the girls that stay in at night.
