Something Strange.

The last of August I published an article in the Graphic giving the number of genuine osteopathic colleges; there are now eight.

A book called Polk's Medical Directory of North America, containing over 3000 pages of "names and patent medicine ads," also contains the names of twenty osteopaths mixed in with ads for such patent medicines as "Kretol," Antikamnia, etc. Sometimes names do get in strange company.

At the end of the list of osteopathic physicians, is a list of the "Schools of Osteopathy," and according to the "Directory" there is one school, and that school is unknown to the American Osteopathic Association and without standing among osteopaths. I wonder why such misrepresentation should be considered necessary by the American Medical Association.

The Other Side.

Editor Graphic:—My mind has been drawn to an article in your last issue, "The Bible in the Public School," and I trust I will not be misunderstood when I say that I for one (and am certain that I represent a large class) am not in favor of the Bible in the public school. Those schools are paid for out of public funds and are intended for the education of the children of all classes and denominations. This is a free country and we boast of our liberty, but when we use the arm of law to force the Bible into the public schools, we break the first principles of our constitution and impose on others what we would not be willing to submit to if we believed as they do. The Catholic for instance will not read the Bible nor allow their children to, and I have known instances where they detained them at home each morning until the morning exercises was over so they would not hear it read. Many others do not want it taught their children, and although these things are to be deplored, yet it is their God given right to believe as they choose.

Real patriotism will respect and defend the rights of others and will not trample on the rights of any.

By all means teach the Bible to the children but let it be in the home, the church and denominational school. Fifteen minutes spent morning and evening by father and mother with the children in the study of the Scriptures and prayer, will do more to instill all those desirable traits into our little ones than the careless reading of a chapter in the school room.

The writer says he would not have it taught according to the tenets of any church but as our teachers are of all "isms," many even holding infidel views with no faith in God's word and it being a spiritual book is spiritually discerned, how could its precepts be taught aright. Much more might be said but this is sufficient. Yours for justice and equal rights.
