Worth Coulson has been over from Scotts Mills during the week giving his former college mates the glad hand. Since graduating from college in 1905 he has been engaged in prune growing and has been very successful. During the winter he took an extended trip to Iowa and Kansas and returned by way of California having a great time. He says a big boom is now on at Scotts Mills on account of the operations of the coal prospectors who have been at work there for several months. Prospects are so flattering that a shaft is being sunk, and in consequence, real estate is now held at double the price asked for it a year ago.

The Gold Dollar strawberry which was originated by Zimri Mills, of Springbrook, has proved to be a berry of great merit and this season it made big money for Mr. Mills. The Oregon Agriculturist says: Messrs. Z. Mills & Son, of Springbrook, Oregon, use a fine lithographed label on one end of each crate of their Gold Dollar strawberries which they send to market. We noticed that retail grocers who displayed these berries placed the crates in such a way that the attractive end of the crate was visible and thus Messrs. Mills & Sons received the advertising benefit to which they are entitled, as a reward of their enterprise. We may add that the Gold Dollar makes the best appearance of any of the very early varieties of strawberries which are seen in Portland.

WHAT THE KETTLE SINGS.

Kettle, oh, kettle, get onto your job,
Sing a song from your perch on the hob.
A Kettle (see poets) should blithesome-ly sing—
No matter just what; give us any old thing.
"What shall I sing about—what shall it be?"
Kettle, oh, kettle, just sing about tea.
"I've heated the water for many a brand,
I've sampled the tea-leaves from many a land
I've sniffed at their savor and tasted the brew,
And I like CHASE & SANBORN'S the best, honest true!"
Kettle, oh, kettle, now why do you blow
For this kind so stoutly—and how do you know?
"I've seen 'em uncurl when the water's been hot,
Releasing their fragrance and spice in the pot,
Each leaf like a jealousy-clutched little hand
That held a rich gift from the far Orient-land.
I've seen 'em diffuse all their richness there stored
As my spout its libation upon them has poured,
I've sniffed the bouquet through my long, eager nose,
And know it's as sweet as the Orient-land rose.
And I say once again, and you listen to me,
Be sure CHASE & SANBORN import all your tea."
