To Teach Obedience.

Nearly every boy who enters business life without the advantages of a good education regards the position of office boy as the most natural, if not the only door; and in the main this is true. There must always be office boys, no matter how many new business appliances are invented; but the supply, although equal to the demand in quantity, is unsatisfactory in quality.

In the hope of improving this condition somewhat, the Children's Aid Society of New York has undertaken a school for office boys. The pupils will be taught many things, but above all, obedience. "The first thing we shall instill into a boy," says the head of the school, "is the understanding that he must do exactly as he is told."

An office boy with the idea of obedience firmly fixed is already pretty well equipped for his duties. In a Western city a boy lately entered the office of a business house from a good home. One day his employer told him to do a certain thing, and having found it undone later in the day, asked the boy why he had neglected it.

"Oh, I didn't feel like doing it," was the answer made naturally and without any thought of being impudent. The employer promptly knocked the boy down.

The interesting sequel to the story is that when the boy went home it was not to complain of the employer, but to upbraid his parents for never having taught him to obey.

His complaint was not unjust. To whom should a boy look for the great lesson of obedience, if not to his parents? A generation ago he might have got some knowledge of the value of discipline from the schools, but the abolition of corporal punishment and the changed public attitude toward punishment of any kind have robbed the schools of most of the disciplinary value they once had. Only the other day the old teacher died who was credited by the late Roscoe Conkling with having made him a United States Senator by a thrashing he once gave him in school.

The responsibility of parents in inculcating obedience is greater now than ever before. Not even a school for office boys can do all the work.—Youth's Companion.

Don't be ashamed to take the wife's advice. She knows a great deal more than she pretends, and has reserves of sense that would astonish you if you could see them.—November Farm Journal.
