Rest After Meals.

Hurried eating of meals, followed immediately by some employment that occupies the whole attention and takes up all or nearly all of the physical energies, is sure to result in dyspepsia in one form or another. Sometimes it shows itself in excessive irritability, a sure indication that nerve force has been exhausted.

The double draft, in order to digest the food and carry on the business, has been more than nature could stand without being thrown out of balance. Nature does not do two things at a time and do both well as a rule. All know that when a force is divided it is weakened. If the meal were eaten slowly, without preoccupation of the mind, and the stomach allowed at least half an hour's chance to get its work well undertaken before the nervous force were turned in another direction patients suffering from dyspepsia would be comparatively few.—Family Doctor.

Dancing by Halves.

"At a dance the other night I met the most popular girl I ever saw," said a Harlem bachelor. "I asked her to dance. She said she would like to, but she had only half a dance left. If I was willing to take that, all right."

"It was a new experience to share one dance with a rival, but I agreed to her terms. I thought up to the last minute that she was fooling, but when my part of the waltz was done—she put me down for the first half—she glided away from me and sailed off in the arms of the other chap, who had been standing around awaiting his opportunity."

"That is what I call popularity raised to its very highest power."—New York Globe.

The Work of His Pen.

They were a very literary looking lot save one. He resembled a small farmer rather than anything else. They were talking of their respective achievements in literature. Young Stimson had written a society drama which had run sixty nights and eight matinees. Jones was doing a serial for the Daily Gusher. Smith was hard at work on a novel which was to cause a positively painful sensation. Brown was writing the fashion articles for a ladies' paper. Robinson had a commission to write a volume of "Far Eastern Reminiscences," he never having been farther east than Stratford in his life. "I also make a fine living by my pen," observed the farmer-like individual during a brief pause in the conversation.

"What! You?" came in chorus. "How?" "You see, I breed pigs!" Then they all started some other topic of conversation.—London Sketch.

Where Emeralds Come From.

Colombia, South America, controls the world's market for emeralds as completely as the South African syndicate does for diamonds. It is from the mines high up in the Colombian Andes that most of the emeralds come. The Colombian government has leased its most valuable mines to an English syndicate with the understanding that it is to sell at least $1,250,000 in emeralds a year for twenty years, giving the government a percentage. The largest and most valuable emerald in the world belongs to the Duke of Devonshire. It is a perfect six sided crystal and weighs nearly nine ounces.—New York American.

He Departed.

"I wish"—he sighed, gazing ardently into his beloved one's eyes—"I wish I were a star."

"I would rather," she replied dreamily, "that you were a comet." His heart beat tumultuously against his ribs; his eyes glowed. "And why?" he asked tenderly, taking her unresisting little hand within his own. "Why?" he repeated imperiously.

"Because," she answered, with a brooding earnestness that fell freezing upon his soul, "then you would come around only once in every fifteen years."—London Fun.
