Our merchants say they buy bananas by the pound and that the crates and the packing is charged up to them at the same price per pound, and since they have been losing money by retailing them by the dozen they have called a halt and in the future this tropical fruit will be sold at ten cents per pound straight. About the only way so far known to beat the banana trust, which is said to be responsible for the high prices, is to eat homegrown fruits and let the "brought on" kind rot in the hands of the trust.
