NEWBERG, ORE.

A teacher who is a lover of poetry and is a follower of the school of romanticists was trying to inculcate some of those principles in the minds of her youthful scholars.

She was describing a storm: "Peel after peel of thunder shook the earth, the lightning burst from the clouds and the orange orb of the west hid its splendor on the shoulders of the darkening hills." When she had finished she said, "Now, children, take this subject for your writing lesson and put it in your own words." They did.

One saucer eyed youngster wrote this: "Peel after peel shot down like lightning from the cloudburst, and the orange of the west sunk an orange in the shoulder of the hills, when the light went out."—Philadelphia Times.

Second Nature.

The old schoolmaster was deeply affected. His scholars, noticing the dilapidated appearance of his chair, had presented him with a new one on his birthday.

"My dear boys," said the kindly old pedagogue, with tears in his eyes, "I can never hope to tell you how much you have made me feel by this token of your love for me.

All I can do is to thank you for the sacrifices you have made of your little purses for the sake of my comfort. If you have found me severe at times, I trust you realize that it has always been for your own good. I hope to always have your full confidence, as you have ever had mine."

As the old schoolmaster prepared to sit down in his new chair he unconsciously ran his hand over the seat in search of bent pins.

Steamship Ventilators.

In the paintings of big ocean liners put forth by the steamship companies there's not much chance to go astray naively nor anywhere near the chance for blunders that there is in depicting any sort of sailing ship. But one thing the steamship artists generally do wrong. They point the mouths of the ventilators to windward. At sea ventilators always open to leeward, being shifted as the wind changes. The marine artists often paint ventilators wrong purposely because a long row of red mouthed air shafts looks well, or is thought to. As the direction of the wind is indicated by the smoke drifting back the mistake is glaring.—New York Sun.

TORTURED TO DEATH.

Horrible Fate of Damiens, Who Tried to Kill Louis XV.

As an example of the administration of justice in the reign of Louis XV. history records the trial and death of Robert Damiens.

Damiens was easily excited politically. He became a most dangerous fanatic, seeing in many existing evils a menace to the people. He watched the corruption and extravagance of Louis' court till a crazy idea developed in his mind that he must strike a blow for the good of France.

In the January of 1757 Louis was spending most of his time at the palace of the Little Trianon, in the great park of Versailles. The royal family was at the palace at Versailles, and, hearing that his daughter, Mme. Adelaide, had a severe cold, Louis paid her a visit one afternoon.

A private stairway led from the royal apartments to the court, where his carriage awaited him; two torch bearers stood on either side the coach door. Just as the king reached this door a man in a long coat and a large wig grabbed his shoulder and stabbed him.

The attendants threw themselves on Damiens, but the man made no effort to escape. The weapon he had used was a two bladed clasp knife, and the winter clothing of the king was so thick that the wound was little more than sufficient to draw blood.

Damiens was stripped of all his clothes and at once forced to drink an anti-poison for fear he might have planned to escape the penalty of the law. Then came torture to make him confess his reason for attempting this crime.

Assured that the king would live, attention was given to the matter of punishment for Damiens. He was brought to trial, and his sentence was that he should be torn in quarters by horses on the Place de la Greve, upon which the great city hall of Paris faces.

At 3 o'clock, March 28, Damiens was taken from the prison in the death cart, in which were two priests and the executioner. Arriving at the place of execution, Damiens was kept an hour waiting and during this time calmly watched the preparations for his death. An inclosure had been made by solid planks, giving room enough for the horses to do their deadly work. All about the square the windows and roofs were crowded with spectators.

When all was ready Damiens was placed on a strong wooden table in the inclosure, this table being three feet high. Then his right hand was burned with redhot irons; next red hot pincers made wounds all over his body, and into these were poured boiling lead and oil.

A horse was then fastened to each ankle and each wrist, and the animals were lashed to pull in all directions. It took an hour and a quarter for him to die. His body was then burned on a funeral pile. The next act was to tear down his house. His father, his wife and his daughter were banished from France, and a royal order was given to his brothers and sisters to change their name.

The Green Cap of the Bankrupt.

There was a law in force in France for a century or more that compelled bankrupts to wear green caps. This was done to prevent tradesmen from being imposed upon by such as were unable or unwilling to pay. Successive edicts enlarged the privileges of bankruptcy, but they forfeited them if they appeared in public without green caps. If those who cannot or will not pay their debts were compelled to wear such caps at the present day the streets of most of our cities would have rather a veridant appearance.

Keep Your Temper.

The unwritten laws both of society and good manners are innumerable, but there is one that we cannot pass over in silence, and that is—never lose your temper. This applies especially when playing games. To lose one's temper in private is bad enough, but to do so in public is unpardonable. It is a crime which no hostess can forgive, for it makes all the other guests feel uncomfortable and disturbs that outward calm which is the essence of all good society.

Only Enough For One.

Sheridan was once staying at the house of an elderly maiden lady in the country, who wanted more of his company than he was willing to give. Proposing one day to take a stroll with him, he excused himself on account of the badness of the weather. Shortly afterward she met him sneaking out alone.

"So, Mr. Sheridan," said she, "it has cleared up."
"Just a little, madam—enough for one, but not enough for two."
