THURSDAY, JULY 1, 1915

Swat the fellow who pokes his face in at the door with "is it hot 'nough fer yer?" when it is only 84 in the shade.

The time for the annual meeting of the small boy and toy pistol is near at hand. The family physician will please take due notice.

The News-Reporter says the dog poisoner has been getting in his work in McMinnville, and that twelve animals were laid out in ten days. Rather a low type of citizenship we should say when spite work is spent on dumb brutes.

The cool shade of the maple trees alongside the Graphic office building makes an inviting retreat for those who have the leisure and inclination to congregate and discuss questions of moment these stirring times, and if the increase in numbers and interest continues, there is a fair chance of rivaling the famous "war college" that holds day and night sessions in the street opposite the Evening Telegram office in Portland.

In some of our Eastern exchanges accounts are given of big auto trips made up of numerous machines loaded with Chautauqua boosters, who make a day of it and go out from the Chautauqua centers for advertising purposes. It is not done that way here in Oregon. Next week there is to be a Chautauqua held in a town only fourteen miles from Newberg, but up to the present time no publicity of the fact has been given in Newberg of any kind. In politics a "still hunt" is sometimes considered best, and possibly our neighbors are going to try it out on the Chautauqua.

SWEET CLOVER

Enos Ellis became interested in reading of the experiences others had been having in growing sweet clover in other sections of the country, and two years ago he sent away and secured a small amount of seed for trial. The results have been so satisfactory that he says he feels confident that this is going to be a profitable forage plant for the Willamette Valley.

Thinking that others may be interested, the following article regarding sweet clover is taken from the Globe Democrat:

"A part of Mr. Bryan's humanitarian plans for the conservation of life, and the ending of war as destructive of life, may be revealed in the sowing of his cattle ranches to white sweet clover. The late secretary of state has several ranches or ranges on which cattle herd. He has more than one in Nebraska, and in Texas he has a large tract of land, on which, during several successive seasons, he raised profitable crops of Bermuda onions. Being a shrewd business man, Mr. Bryan, has seen the larger profits to be made in beef cattle where cheap range can be found, and has discovered that white sweet clover is an even cheaper forage stock than alfalfa.

"This discovery appears to have been accidental, a part of the business luck which has so strangely run along, side by side, with his poorer luck in politics during the last score of years. It was while making a trip through the West that he stopped at Garden City and saw, for himself, how the white sweet clover flourishes in the soil and semiarid climate of Western Kansas, and how the food value of the clover was attested in the fat herds of cattle growing on it. He at once began cultivating clover on his Nebraska lands, and now it is announced that he will extend its use to his lands in Texas. He will, undoubtedly, find it profitable. Everything to which Mr. Bryan puts his hand in a business way turns to gold."

ROUMANIA.

In some respects Germany and Austria dread the entrance of Roumania into the war more than they dreaded the entrance of Italy. That is not, because Roumania is as strong in a military sense as Italy, for it is not; but because Roumania occupies a position that is strategically stronger, both physically and economically says the Youth's Companion.

It was possible for Germany and Austria to prepare for the entrance of Italy into the war, and in large measure to discount it; but in the case of Roumania the task is harder, for Roumania presents a hostile frontier of five hundred miles on a side that thus far has been free from attack. If Roumania drops the role of neutrality, Germany and Austria will be wholly shut in by active enemies, except for the short frontiers of Denmark, Holland, and Switzerland.

Roumania is the largest of the Balkan states. From its population of more than seven million people it maintains an army, exclusive of reserves, of more than half a million men, exceedingly well trained and equipped. That army, it has been said, is more to be feared in war than any other of its size in Europe. The Roumanians are soldiers by tradition and liking, and are obliged to render military service of one sort or another for twenty-one years. Moreover, their country has a peculiar advantage in the fact that it produces all the food it needs. In time of peace it has a large surplus of grain for export, and in the early part of the present war Germany felt that it could count on the supply of Roumanian grain.

But Roumania is ambitious. It was not exhausted by the Balkan wars that prostrated its neighbor and rival, Bulgaria, and it sees an opportunity to extend its borders to include Austrian territory that it has long coveted. Because the government feared Russia, King Charles leaned toward Germany; but the Russian menace now seems to be removed, and King Charles is dead. The Roumanian people are largely of Latin stock, descended from Roman colonists that Trajan planted on the lower Danube, and their descent makes one of their ties with Italy. By means known to diplomats and international financiers, Germany has tried hard to make Roumania an ally or to keep it neutral; but from the first it has seemed probable that it would follow wherever Italy led.

BUSINESS DISENTANGLED.

For ten years now the politics of the United States have revolved mainly about the question whether large units of business should be encouraged or destroyed. One political point of view, held by President Wilson and many other leaders, has been that competition through small units should be preserved and enforced says Colliers. The other point of view, held most conspicuously by the Progressive leaders, has been that large units in business should be encouraged under proper regulation. To-day it is possible to say that the public opinion of the country on this subject is coming more and more to favor the latter economic theory. No one can deny that the verdict of the courts in the case of the National Cash Register Company, following that of the United States Steel Corporation, represents about what the average citizen believes to be right. President Wilson himself, his party, and his Attorney General are all on record in opposition to this trend. It is to be hoped that they will not be led, by mere pride of opinion, to oppose the solution which the courts, by their decisions, are bringing about. The United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the New Jersey district has held, in dismissing the Steel suit, that, in spite of the size of the principal unit, competition in the iron trade is sounder and healthier to-day than ever before. In the Cash Register case the Supreme Court has upheld the decree of the lower court that big business is not necessarily a monopoly. Legitimate business has a constructive destiny, and the State must speed the fulfillment of that destiny just as it must safeguard the public against extortion, crooked finance, and the improper exploitation of labor. The Sherman Law, never clearly defined, now finds sanctuary in the new Federal Trade Commission; which, thanks to these decisions, has a way clear before it as the arbiter of business interests and in a really disinterested supervision of commerce. The public will be the gainer in economy and in efficiency of output, for we are entering upon an era of cooperation rather than conflict.

LEARNING TO SAVE MONEY

During flush times when money comes easily it is difficult to get the average wage earner interested in saving up money for times of sickness and old age. In fact the trend of the age seems to be to allow children to grow into the habit of spending every nickel that comes into their hands, and with this habit firmly fixed from childhood, it is little wonder that so few ever get away from it and learn to lay aside a part of their earnings.

In discussing the matter of saving money a magazine writer says:

"One day a young man 25 years of age told me that he had just fallen heir to $2500. He was going to spend the whole sum on a pure luxury. He said that $2500 was not much money anyway, and that he might as well have a good time with it—even though the good time lasted only a little while.

"When I told him in a general way that he ought to save that money I made no impression on him. But when I explained to him how $2500 invested at six per cent, and compounded annually, would double in twelve years, he began to wake up. At 37 he would have $5,000, at 49 $10,000, and at 61 would be yielding him $1200 a year, a little more than his present salary.

"I had aroused his financial imagination to the first real work it had ever done—so far as I know. He hung onto that money and invested it at six per cent.

"I told him that when he is 61 and has that $20,000 maybe somebody else will give him $2500 and if so to go out and spend it if he wants to. Money spent at 61 by a man of some means is not like money spent at 25 by a young man of no means. The man at 61 has comparatively little chance left for his pile to grow. In fact by 61 he is supposed to have his pile.

"Always when contemplating luxuries consider now old you are before buying. The price of luxuries is much higher in early life than later. It is very high in

Tale of a Stamp.

I'm a stamp—a postage stamp—A two-cent'er!
I make the Government A profit
Of $62,000,000 a year.
Don't want to brag,
But I was never Liked,
Except once;
By a gentleman, too;
He put me on an envelope—
Perfumed, pink, square;
I've been stuck on it Ever since.
He dropped us—
Through a slot in a dark box;
But we were rescued.
A mail clerk hit me an awful Smash with a hammer;
It left my face black and blue;
Then I went on a long Journey.
When we arrived—
The pink envelope and I—
We were presented
To a perfect love
Of a girl,
Say, she's a dream!
Well, she mutilated
The pink envelope and me
With a hat pin;
Then she read inside.
I never saw a girl blush
So beautifully!
Say, she kissed me.
Oh, you little godlets!
We—
The pink envelope and I—
Are now nestling snugly
In her bosom;
We can hear her heart throb;
When it goes faster
She takes us out
And kisses me.
Oh say
This is great!
I'm glad
I'm a stamp—
A two-cent'er,
Even if
The One Cent
Letter Postage Association
Is after my scalp.

YAMHILL COUNTY ROADS COMMENDED

Mr. and Mrs. Henry L. Bents, Miss Lieta Bents, accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. N. C. Wescott and son Thomas, made an automobile trip Sunday to Independence, via Salem, returning by the way of Dallas, McMinnville and Newberg. The polk county and Yamhill county highways are a revelation to those who live along the trails that pass for roads in North Marion county. Not only are their roads across the Willamette in fine condition, but miles and miles of roadway in Yamhill county have been oiled, and are as smooth and dustless as a paved street. A trip over these roads leads one almost involuntarily to wonder what is wrong with the road making system in Marion county.—Aurora Observer.

FROM THE CARLTON SENTINEL

Nothing good comes from profanity. It is something useless and senseless. It is shocking to the sensibilities and grates on the nerves of refined people.

Mr. and Mrs. W. W. Silver, of Newberg, Kansas friends of the editor and wife, and Rev. and Mrs. C. O. Whitely, of the same city, passed through Carlton

Thursday afternoon en route to Panther creek on a fishing and camping trip.

John Hendricks, of Hendricks gap, purchased a Ford auto on Saturday. When next heard from, he (with others) was donating work on improving the road between his place and Carlton. More autos, better roads, seems to be the logical result.

The Ramblers attended service at West Chehalis church Sunday morning. A Kansas friend of theirs, Rev. H. G. Crocker, who is fruit farming about three miles from there, is the pastor. This is a union community church and the arrangement seems to work very satisfactorily in most ways. We went on to Newberg and in the afternoon feasted our eyes on the magnificent rose gardens of the Quaker city. Many rows of the beautiful Testout roses are in the parking spaces. We dropped into a service of the Holiness Association in a former store room and heard "testimonies" given, some to the accompaniment of "woven paces and waving hands," perhaps founded on 1 Tim. 2:8; "I will that men pray everywhere, lifting up holy hands, without wrath and doubting."
